Rogers, Andrew J. The passing of Satan, death and hell: the solution of the allegory. Richmond, Va., [published by the author, A. J. Rogers,] 1903. c. 5-227 p. por. D. cl., $1.

The writer calls this a "story," but it is really a series of interesting religious discussions between the Rev. Thomas Hopkins, the newly installed pastor of the leading Methodist church of the town of Kempton, and one of the officers of his church, whose liberal interpretation of the teachings of the Bible has caused much adverse criticism. Mr. Hopkins gives Mr. Greenhow a long hearing on the subjects of Satan, death and hell, and finally admits that though his views are apparently unorthodox they are in harmony with the spirit of the Bible.

"This investigation contains an examination of the Hebrew influence on the language of the authorized version. The subject was suggested to the author by Prof. Paul Haupt in the autumn of 1894. Since that time the authorized version has been read a number of times and carefully compared with the Hebrew text. While the list of Hebraisms in the appendix is confined to the Old Testament, the New Testament contains a great number, which the author hopes to present for publication at some future time."—Preface.

While some of the personages that appeared in a book entitled "A guardian of the poor," published in 1897, re-appear in "Borlase & Son," this is in no sense a sequel to the former book. Borlase & Company represents a cheap store or "emporium" of South London. The evils of its management are shown up very plainly. Stanton Borlase is the adopted son of Mr. Borlase who is all of the firm of Borlase & Company. It is his revolt at the methods of his adopted father that makes the story.

The action of the story takes place on board an English sailing-vessel—the Dealman—bound on a voyage from England to an island off the coast of Cape Horn. The object of the voyage is to raise part of the valuable cargo of a steamer that had foundered in a bay of the island. The captain of the Dealman had just been married; his wife finds it very hard to be separated from him, and manages to smuggle herself aboard his ship. This is against orders, but when she is discovered it is too late to put her ashore. The adventures of the ship and "the captain's wife," are numerous and startling.

Sadlier, Anna Theresa. The talisman. N. Y., Benziger Bros., 1903. c. 186 p. il. D. cl., 60 c.

The story of a boy of sixteen who lived with his mother in a small but comfortable homestead in the town of Hartford on the Connecticut River in early Colonial days. They were Catholics but dared not openly admit their faith. A priest, a missionary among the Indians, visits them one day secretly and gives the boy Edward a curiously wrought reliquary of red cornelian set about with a rim of gold and containing a holy relic. This talisman, recognized by Indians and others, twice saves his life.

In this fresh interpretation of our national history, Miss Semple shows the tremendous part that geography has played in emigration, war, travel, and commerce. The position of mountains and mountain passes, the size and direction of rivers, the course of trails are seen to have been powerful factors in the life of the nation. The author shows that they have determined the course of emigration, the plan of campaigns in war, the distribution of settlements, and laid down in advance the lines of our railroads. Chapters on inland waters will throw light on the project of deepening the Erie Canal, and others of lively and general interest are those on the Louisiana Purchase and the subject of irrigation. Miss Semple is an associate editor of "The Journal of ...graphy" and an accepted authority in her field, ...g a favorite pupil of the great German geogra... Dr. Ratzel.

The circulation in the labyrinth is worked out for the ear of the pig by using Eichler's method of making celloidin casts of the labyrinth. A large series of embryos was injected, of sizes measuring from 2½ cm. in length to the embryo at full term, measuring about 30 cm. The simpler scheme for the distribution of vessels found in the younger embryos was utilized in interpreting the complicated system of vessels found in the labyrinth at full term. Eight drawings in colors illustrate the articles.

Leaving the subject of politics and prisons to other writers, he restricts his work to a description of the railway and of the country through which it passes.

Sholl, Anna McClure. The law of life. N. Y., Appleton, 1903. [Ag.] c. 7+572 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

"Hallworth University, endowed and erected for the higher education of young men and women by a self-made American citizen," is the scene of an unusually strong novel. The life of Hallworth is vividly described both from the faculty and the post-graduate standpoint, and evidently by one who knows. Its social and student life, its fascinations and monotony and the possibilities for romance, are drawn most skilfully. The dialogue, always clever, is often brilliant and is used largely to tell the story. The heart of the book is a passionate love tale. The characters concerned in it being a young girl married to an eccentric professor of mathematics twice her age. Too late she realizes her marriage is a mistake, and that she loves a younger man. One of the great charms of the work is its modernness.

The Prof. of English Literature in Knox College, Galesburg, Ohio, has accepted suggestions of practical utility from the text-books of Pancoast, of Moody and Lovett, of Halleck, and of Johnson. He divides his subject according to centuries and for each century presents as many essential facts in its literary history as possible. He follows the biographical method more closely than some authors and gives less scope to technical criticism. The suggestions for study of separate books are an important feature of this very compact and very practical text-book. Maps, tables, facsimile title-pages. Index.

Champaign, Ill., D. H. Lloyde & Son, [1903.] 91 p. D. cl., $1.

The motive which prompted the writing of this syllabus, has been largely the desire to be of assistance to the students of the library school, by helping to lighten, to some extent, the labors of note-taking. The outline is based upon a course of lectures presented to the senior class of the Illinois State Library School during the academic years of 1901 and 1902. The work is divided into twelve lectures, to each of which is appended a list of authorities, including both books and periodicals.

A general defense of the theory that "educational science is not only possible, but that it is in fact, an independent science, with a technique of its own, developed by an investigation of problems made from a purely educational standpoint." The aims of this science, according to the author, are formulated upon an ethical basis as the means are on a psychological one. The author further contends that all teachers should receive professional training, and that a good physique, natural aptitude, scholarship, and culture should be demanded as prerequisites.

By the editor of "Turrets, towers and temples," "Great pictures," "Famous paintings," etc. Two principles of selection have guided the compiler in the preparation of this book, the sixth of a series that has met with a cordial reception. One is the beauty or interest from an artistic standpoint, the other the historical associations. Descriptions generously illustrated have been taken from Ruskin, Dickens, Pierre Loti, Gautier, Symonds, Hare and many other writers.

The hero, a southerner, inherits a lumber mill in a Wisconsin town, and with it the legacy of his uncle's relations to the townspeople, which were not always friendly. He finds himself involved in various antagonisms: with the northern sentiment of the people—a lingering effect of the war; with his workingmen; and with a group of socialistic and temperance fanatics. There is a strike during which an attempt is made upon the hero's life. The climax is a great forest fire.

The little hamlet of Barbizon on the edge of the Forest of Fontainebleau was the haunt or home of a group of French artists who gave rise to the name of the Barbizon school. The most notable of the group were the four artists that Prof. Sprague celebrates in this volume—Millet, Corot, Rousseau and Barye. He gathered the delightful facts and reminiscences that he has embodied in four sketches in a summer spent near Fontainebleau some ten years ago, and also made the photographs there which adorn the book. These charming lectures have been given from time to time to the public—but have only just now appeared in book form.

The aim of this work, says the author, "is to give an account of the things done in the Mississippi Valley during the period of foreign control. It is intended to be a narrative, not a critical history. The writer has tried to tell about the achievements of the men who traversed the Great Lakes in birch bark canoes, or walked through the passes of the Alleghenies, to reach the Mississippi Valley, and, when there, turned the mighty wilderness into the Garden of the World." Naturally the story begins with the heroic Frenchmen who first learned the way to the Great Basin—Jean Nicolet, La Salle and others. Following is an account of the expelling of the French from the valley; then chapters on: The Spanish in the great valley; Pontiac's war; Lord Dunmore's war; The home makers in Kentucky; The instructive story of the work of George Rogers Clark, in the Illinois county, etc. The romantic narrative is profusely illustrated by rare portraits, views of historic places, maps, facsimiles, etc. Miss E. S. Clark furnishes many pen and ink sketches, for chapter headings, head and tail pieces, etc.

One of the most thorough and comprehensive works on the tariff yet written. It covers the whole ground from colonial times to the Dingley Tariff, and is the result of a careful study of the original sources as well as of all prior works upon the history of single tariffs, or of the subject as a whole. It is written frankly from the protectionist point of view, and avoids merely academic discussion of the theories of protection and free trade. Among the noteworthy original discussions, aside from that upon the Constitutionality of Protection, the following may be mentioned: The protective character of the first tariff; Hamilton's Report on manufactures; Secretary Walker's report (1846); The situation after the close of the Civil War; The industrial upheaval in the last qarter of the nineteenth century.

Playwright and book illustrator is Murray Davenport, a man of varied gifts, but one who has been most unfortunate in his contact with real life. His sudden determination to right himself in a grievous wrong, irrespective of the legal side of the question, and his change of identity are the story. The mystery is well managed, a love story and scenes from New York life belonging to the narrative.

Stephenson, Nathaniel. Eleanor Dayton. N. Y., J: Lane, 1903. [Ag.] c. 315 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The story begins in Paris in the late fifties and the heroine, an American girl from Ohio is distinguished by the notice of Napoleon III. at an exhibition of art. The emperor prophecies suffering which shall bring out the look the artist has already put into her portrait. A picture is then given of Eleanor's childhood and girlhood. The Civil War changes all things and Eleanor through love and sacrifice has gained what Napoleon foresaw. In 1872 she again sees the Emperor, fallen from his high place, a lonely inmate of Chiselhurst, England, and after all the years he recognizes the look that first fascinated him in her portrait.

He puts before us with dramatic power the every-day life of the men and women who spend many of their days behind the bars, and the honest poor who are herded with these in tenements where the conditions are indescribable. American readers will be especially attracted by the part which a young American plays in cleaning out this London tenement district.

A detective story. The plot turns upon the murder of an old millionaire, who is found at his desk down town, dead, with a knife sticking in his throat. The discoverer of the body is a trusted clerk who is obviously innocent, but is forced to admit, from a sense of duty, that the old man's daughter was with him behind closed doors, just before the murder. Everything seems to point to Miss Holladay's guilt, especially as she refuses to explain where she was at the moment in which her father met his death. The story is most ingeniously worked out.

A pathetic story of child life. The hero, George Washington Jones, is a little colored boy, whose only relative, an aged grandfather, died a few days before the holiday season, and left the little boy homeless; taking his fortunes in his own hands on a Christmas day he went forth to offer himself as a gift. After suffering many rebuffs, George figures in the wonderful experiences described.

Prepared as a general introduction to the early Scottish literature, considered as a continuation of the old Northumbrian. The romance of "Rauf Coilyear" is especially suited to this purpose, being written in the purest Scottish of the fifteen century, avoiding pedantries and Latinisms on the one side, and vulgarisms on the other. It holds an intermediate place between the chivalry-romance and the humorous folk-tale. The introduction comprises a concise account of the Scottish poets from Barbour to the Reformation, a brief study of the Scottish language of the literary period, and an estimate of the poem itself.

The professor of modern philosophy in the Collège de France from his office of Magistrate gathered overwhelming evidence "that in all the affairs of men, whether of good or evil report, imitation is an ever-present factor; and to a philosophical mind the implication was obvious that there must be psychological or sociological laws of imitation, worthy of the most thorough study." The first edition of his great study appeared in 1890, the second in 1895. American scholars have often requested that his thought should be made accessible to English speaking readers. The translator is lecturer on sociology in Barnard College.

The scene is laid in Moscow at the time of the election of Peter the Great, when the intrigues of rival parties overturned the existing government, and the meeting of the National Guard made the city the scene of a hideous riot. It resembles in some points Miss Taylor's first story, "On the red staircase," especially in the date, the principal scenes and the fact that the hero is a French nobleman.

The subject is presented in a form especially adapted to the needs of technological institutions and of the engineer. Practical applications are everywhere given an important place. The second and third chapters are devoted to an elementary review of logarithms and to the solution of right triangles, thus giving an early introduction to the consideration of practical problems.

Tebtunis (The) papyri. pt. 1; ed. by Bernard P. Grenfell, Arthur S. Hunt and J. Gilbart Smyly. N. Y., Oxford Univ. Press, 1902. 19+674 p. Q. (University of California publications, Græco-Roman archæology, v. 1.) bds., $16.

The papyri which form the subject of the present volume were found by the editors in the winter of 1899-1900 at Umm el Baragât (the ancient Tebtunis) in the south of the Fayûm, when they were excavating for the University of California with funds provided by Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst. This volume deals with papyri taken from the mummies of crocodiles which with a few exceptions belong to the end of the second or to the early part of the first century B.C.

This work is published in two distinct editions, one for class use, the other for the general public. The former is printed in the "Athenæum Press Series." In addition to Dr. Van Dyke's elaborate introduction it contains copious notes and a scholarly classification of Tennyson's metres. The latter has no commentary, but all the poems and Dr. Van Dyke's introduction, and is gotten up in more ornate style. There are 136 selections. The text of the poems is that of Tennyson's latest revision. The introduction gives a sketch of Tennyson's relation to his times, an account of the poet's life, a description of the way in which he worked, and finally a summary of the leading characteristics of his poetry.

Thurston, Katherine Cecil. The circle; il. by Reginald B. Birch. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1903. [Ja.] c. 6+340 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

That life is not a straight line, but a circle, and that fate or providence often brings us back to the starting point of our youth, is the author's text, illustrated in the life of a young Russian girl living in a London slum with an old bookworm of a father (an exile), the proprietor of a curio shop. Anna Solny is pursuaded by a woman of fashion to desert her father and home to study for the stage. The girl has genius and in years becomes a great actress, acquires wealth and a social position. How and why her life turns back again to the little shop in Felt Street, there to find content and happiness in an honorable man's love, the story tells with much grace and sympathy.

While not condoning Arnold's treason, Mr. Todd emphasizes his invaluable services to America, and shows conclusively that he four times saved the cause of the Colonies: first at the battle of Valcour's Island on Lake Champlain; second, by raising the siege of Fort Stanwix in the Mohawk Valley and putting to flight St. Leger's invading army marching to aid Burgoyne, and third and fourth by winning the two battles of Saratoga, which, conjoined, Cressy included as one of the fifteen decisive battles of the world. Mr. Todd also shows that it was the influence of Arnold's wife and his fear of losing her should her treasonable correspondence with the British officers be discovered, which induced Arnold to betray his country, and not the gross injustice of Congress nor the calamities of paper generals—the motives generally ascribed.

A Robinson Crusoe like story. The Sirdar homeward bound from Shanghai is totally wrecked by a typhoon in the China Sea. Only two of her passengers are saved—one a charming young English girl and the other an ex-officer of the Indian Army. They are cast upon an uninhabited island, where they remain for about six weeks, a searching party finally taking them off. They have many romantic experiences besides falling in love with each other.

The finding of a gold mine gives them fabulous wealth, and their island is invaded by Dyaks, the Borneo head hunters, who are besieging them, when the steamer sent in search of them appears.

This work is not only a genealogy but it is a colonial history of Mass., Conn., New York and New Jersey, a military history of the various wars of our country, and its political history from the beginning down to the present day, for many of the members of these five prominent families were actors in many stirring scenes and events. It contains a remarkable list of names of distinguished men and women, including a Vice-President of the United States, 9 United States Senators, 11 Governors, 3 Cabinet Officers, 1 Justice of the United States Supreme Court, 13 College Presidents and 70 College Professors, besides many distinguished authors, divines, reformers and financiers. The work, in two volumes, constitutes one of the largest genealogical works ever published. Several indexes aid consultation.

The general scope and purpose of this book are in the main those of the series to which it belongs. The author, however, has adopted a rather broader scale of treatment, because he believes that the most characteristic feature of American literature is its "democratic or citizen note," which has caused a large proportion of writers to write "for the greatest good of the greatest number." The book is divided into four main parts: The Colonial period (1607-1764); the Revolutionary period (1765-1788); the formative period (1789-1829); and the sectional period (1830-1865.) A brief conclusion sketches the conditions of literature from the close of the Civil War to the present day—no attempt being made to criticise living authors. Bibliography (11 p.).

Mr. Trowbridge is well known as the author of novels, poems and stories for boys and girls. In the story of his own life he tells of his boyhood on a farm in western New York—then almost a wilderness—of his struggles to secure an education, and his first efforts as a writer which led him to New York and Boston, where he was thrown with some of the most eminent and picturesque men of the day. His reminiscences of Walt Whitman, Father Taylor, Emerson, Alcott, Longfellow and other men of letters are fresh and charmingly told. Especially intimate are his portraits of the men upon the staff of such periodicals as The Atlantic Monthly, The Youth's Companion, and Our Young Folks.

The story of a minister of a small church in a country town, who believes literally in the teachings of Christ. His young wife had deserted him to go upon the stage. When the story opens she has returned to the town after many years, with a little child and apparently in a dying condition. His attitude towards her and that of some of his congregation, illustrate rare Christian charity.

Phillipa, Hope, Theo, and Madge were the daughters of a genius, who on account of the versatility of his talents was not a success from a worldly standpoint; fearing that his daughters might err in the same direction, the genius cautioned each to cultivate that talent which she possessed in the highest degree. This advice is followed after his death and the experiences of the four girls in London are noteworthy.

After the finding of the rich gold deposits on the Yukon River, and later in the beach sands of Cape Nome, it was thought the deposits might have extended to the adjacent coast of Asia. To test this Washington Vanderlip went on a hunt for copper, sulphur, and gold deposits in Kamchatka and northern Siberia; he had many exciting experiences, some of which nearly cost him his life. He spent fourteen months prospecting for a Russian syndicate, and lived with the natives as one of them. While Mr. Vanderlip was the chief actor in the scenes described, his story is set down by Homer B. Hulbert, editor of the Korean Review.

Contains the experiences of two ladies both trained writers, who set out to discover by actual experience the conditions of American working-girls. In a Pittsburg pickle factory, in a mill town of New York, among the clothing makers of Chicago, the Lynn makers of shoes, the hands of the southern cotton mills—in these diverse surroundings the facts about the working-women are given from the standpoint of a more fortunate fellow woman. The conclusions are most interesting and without sensationalism.

John T. Flint, known in Chicago as the "flour Baron," relies upon the Duke of Hastings, an English peer, to place him on a solid social basis in New York. The Duke failing him, he engages the services of a man who resembles the peer to personate that nobleman. The Duke's double is seen in some striking situations in which an American heiress likewise figures.

Three fantastic stories in which the chief personages are made to exchange identities, by "Perkins the fakeer," a man who has spent many years studying oriental mysteries in India. The transpositions are extremely funny. In the first story the husband is changed to the wife; in the second "Remsen," who don't know a note of music, exhibits as a performer of Chopin; while "Clarissa's troublesome baby" is most original.

The writer of these letters is a daughter of the late Charles King, President of Columbia College in the City of New York from 1849 to 1864, and a granddaughter of Rufus King, the second minister sent to England by the United States after the adoption of the Constitution. Miss King was educated in this country. In 1871, after the death of her father, she went with her mother and sisters, to live in France, and in 1874 became the wife of M. William Henry Waddington. Mme. Waddington accompanied her husband on important missions to both England and Russia. The letters collected in this volume were written during the period of her husband's diplomatic service to describe to her sisters the personages and incidents of her official life.

It was on a day in June, in the threatening times of the Revolutionary War in France, that young Carroll Dare, the master of Manor Dare, hears news that his sister Elinor, Countess of Montfort, is in danger from her enemies, and that she is lost if none will go to her succor. Her husband has been murdered, and she and her little son are in the power of those who hate them both. Carroll Dare sets out for France at once, but there are those awaiting his arrival who mean him harm. He is waylaid and almost murdered. But through webs and witcheries and plots and perils he finally finds his way to his sister's side and brings her back in triumph.

Waggaman, Mary T. The Playwater plot. N. Y., Benziger Bros., 1903. c. 2-188 p. il. D. cl., 60 c.

The story opens with the coming of Mrs. Leonard and her sick boy, Lester, to stay with the Wades at Playwater Springs. The boy has been an invalid from birth, but is a millionaire twice over and thoroughly spoiled. There is a plot on foot to abduct him for ransom. How it is carried out and the plotters captured and the boy rescued makes an interesting story for young people.

An epoch-making contribution to the philosophy of man's relation to the world he lives in. It aims to prove that earthly man is the only living and thinking being in the whole universe. The author bases his conclusions upon a masterly marshaling of the many facts of astronomy, biology and geology that modern science and discovery have put us in possession of. He holds that we and our world are the centre of the universe.

Mrs. Wallace describes in the first part of the book scenes which she fancies must have been familiar to the child Jesus. Beginning with an account of Christ's journey from Galilee to Jerusalem to attend the Passover, she pictures notable features of Nazareth, Galilee, Bethany and other famous cities in the Holy Land dwelling on the splendors of the Garden, cities and walls of ancient Jerusalem. In the second part she portrays modern Jerusalem, and contrasts its present desolation with the former beauty of the city.

The author claims to have discovered life's great law, which is not only the analogue but is also the counterpart of Newton's Law of gravitation, answering to vital existence and vital phenomena just as Newton's law answers to mechanical and astronomical phenomena. He also claims to have discovered the "primitive fact" of physiological and medical science; to have simplified medical science, making the practice of medicine—i.e., the science of curing disease as exact as are the sciences of chemistry, astronomy, etc; also by establishing vital science to have completed the fundamental sciences and to have laid the foundation for a true philosophy.

The character around whom the events of the novel revolve is the natural daughter of an Englishwoman of rank. Brilliantly educated in France, she is introduced into London society after her mother's death by Lady Henry Delafield, a woman of assured position, who makes her her companion. Fascinating and highly intelligent, full of tact and ambitious of social success she quickly wins appreciation and admiration. Her story has to do chiefly with her relations to two men, who both ardently love her. The scenes and characters are taken from the most exclusive circles of London's social life, and are presented with unusual power.

The writer believes that with women to a greater degree than with men lies the weal and woe of tomorrow. He believes the sex distinction involves far more than a diversity of physical functions, and that the woman is so far different from the man that she must be judged by other standards, even by other moral standards. The words to mothers are specially candid. The author has already published "The young man in modern life."

Dr. Warren's "Ten thousand a year" was given to the reading world over sixty years ago and had an enormous sale. But the novel was an unusually long one, with much extraneous matter in the way of medical, legal and political discussions. It is this matter Dr. Brady has cut out of the narrative, leaving the story itself as absorbing as it ever was. The abridgment has been made with the consent and approval of Dr. E. Walpole Warren, the son of the author.

This is probably the first book on the subject of the decorative use of flowers, and with its abundant illustration it awakens a fresh interest in the use and arrangement of flowers for beautifying interiors. The author has treated the subject seriously as a branch of art, and applies the principles of art to govern its practice. He points out the importance of harmony in color and form, not only between the flowers used, but the flowers and their receptacles and surroundings.

The early poetry of America should be divided into three distinct classes, the religious, the patriotic, the humorous. To the first class belong all the odes and elegies written in a wonderfully verbose style, with remarkably long and heartrending titles. The patriotic is the most interesting and from a historical standpoint the most valuable. The most interesting examples in this class are the pamphlets and broadsides written during the Revolutionary War. In the third class are found the works of some of the most famous of our early American writers. The list is believed to be as perfect a gathering of titles of books and pamphlets as can be made at the present time.—The Compiler, Oscar Wegelin.

Wharton, Mrs. Edith. Sanctuary; with il. by Walter Appleton Clark. N. Y., Scribner, 1903. [O.] c. 5+184 p. O. cl., †$1.50.

A novel which deals with a question of heredity, and which also attempts by force of the action of two of the characters to solve a psychological problem. Kate Orme, who has very high ideals, is disillusionized shortly after her betrothal by a confession of her lover. For reasons explained in the story she keeps her troth. After the death of her husband, and her son has become a man, the woman of ideals, sees him in a position similar to the one which confronted his father. The issues are interesting.

Thackeray forbid that a personal biography of him should be written. The author has judiciously used the prefaces to her father's works made by Mrs. Ritchie for his biographical facts. The value of the book is that it passes under review every work of Thackeray's with the exception of his poems and gives them a reasonable balance of space and attention. The writer shows a little timidity in assigning to Thackeray his final place in English literature. He thinks that his was a dual nature and that in it were strangely blended cynicism and sentimentality.

The young woman whose name gives this novel its title, holds advanced opinions as to the higher education of women. They do not, however, prevent her from falling in love with a man of quite opposite ideas. This love story, charmingly told, with many witty conversations, and sharp character drawing, is the heart of the book—which is not a contribution to the solution of the woman question. The scene shifts between Mt. Desert, New York, Boston, Cambridge, and a small Massachusetts town called "Kenton."

Whiteing, R: The yellow van. N. Y., Century Co., 1903. [O.] c. '02, '03. 2+379 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A story showing the deep gulf that separates the luxurious, pleasure-seeking life of England's great estate owners from the sordid, hopeless existence of their tenants. The Duke of Allonby travelling in America has met and married Augusta Gooding and made her his Duchess. Her brother later comes to England to invest American trust funds and together they listen to the woes of the people. The author of "No. 5 John Street" does justice to the good and the evil of both the English and American systems of land ownership. The "Yellow van" is the house on wheels that carries about an orator who insists that "we'll have England for the English people yet."

Mr. Whitman first gained attention as an authority on German affairs by a book he wrote in 1888, entitled "Imperial Germany." Mr. Whitman made the acquaintance of Bismarck shortly after he retired from office, and claims that he is now the only Englishman living who was in any sense intimate with the great Chancellor. During the last seven years of Bismarck's life Mr. Whitman visited him no less than ten times. He arrived at Bismarck's home for the last visit a few hours after Bismarck had breathed his last. Outside the family not more than a dozen persons saw the dead statesman, and of these Whitman was one. As a result of this intimacy with Bismarck and his family this volume contains matter which is exclusive and of historical interest.

Lord Penzance does not add any new facts to the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy. He simply recapitulates briefly and plainly all the arguments and facts already given to the public. He has made a thorough study of the authorship of the Shakespeare plays and considers the inquiry whether Bacon was the author of all or any of the works hitherto attributed to Shakespeare, "altogether unprofitable until the jury of the intelligent and educated world are satisfied that Shakespeare was not."

"In the theory of evolution there is an important principle not yet worked out. . . . Christianity can make use of all the truth of evolution without giving up any of its peculiar teachings. . . . It can show itself to be the only key to the secret of the universe. . . . Evolutionists have ignored many of the facts of man's moral and spiritual life because they have not grasped the fundamental fact that man is a moral and spiritual being." The author strives to put science and religion at rights and to give the Christian faith a new hold upon all thoughtful men.

David, an artist, and his wife started on their wedding journey in a runabout drawn by a well-loved horse named "Sweet Emma Moreland." They were as happy as the proverbial kings and queens after they had settled down in the Valley of Happy Content. Belinda, John, David and Beulah in turn became kings and queens over their happy parents. Poems written by mother, father and all the children make up the bulk of the book.

The scene of the novel is Washington. The principal characters are Senator Cushman and his wife. Although the Senator's love story takes up most of the space, other romantic episodes of social life and diplomatic circles are introduced. The incidents are evidently those of real life. In some instances real names are given, in other cases they are fictitious. Many prominent persons figure in the story.

The author says "I have made no attempt to justify the present condition of trade and industry, nor have I intimated that great improvement is not possible. I have labored to establish the fact that the interests of labor and capital are one and the same. And that the remedy for our political and financial ills, whatever they may be, is not in a more socialistic government, but in a more thorough education of the people in first principles, from the richest to the poorest and from the highest to the lowest."

It was Prince Bismarck's desire that these letters should be published. He himself selected them and carefully arranged them in portfolios. Volume 1 is devoted to the correspondence with Emperor William which shows the unique relationship between the premier and his master. Volume 2 is devoted to letters to important political personages. The Athenaeum has pronounced the translation good. Contains no new historical matter but is of interest to general public. A letter of the Emperor is given in facsimile.

These speeches are grouped under subject headings such as "The Kaiser for peace and reconciliation," "Promoting the welfare of the empire." "The Kaiser in more intimate circles." All of the Kaiser's important speeches are given in full, particularly those in which he touches upon American affairs and topics of interest to Americans. One can form a very just estimate of the emperor's life and character from the work. Also gives his mottoes and his most characteristic sayings before and after he became emperor.

Williams, Francis Churchill. The captain; il. by Arthur I. Keller. Bost., Lothrop Pub. Co., [1903.] [Ja.] c. 4-439 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.
A romance dealing with life on the eve of the Civil War and during it. Most of the people come from south of Mason-Dixon's line, and we see the struggle from their standpoint and sympathize with their difficulties in taking sides for or against the Union. The great figure of the captain, who will be at once recognized as General Grant, dominates the whole story, and offers the most striking portrait of that unique figure yet to be found in American fiction. The political events leading up to the great struggle and the battle scenes themselves are ably drawn.

A tale of the Mormon settlement of Salt Lake City. In the central character of Joel Rae, the author has drawn a pathetic figure of a religious mystic, who comes by hard experience to see that the Mormon teachings are dire in their significance, especially upon women. His love for his adopted daughter and the child's growth into fair young womanhood, when she is won by a cowboy, are admirably depicted. Includes such dramatic scenes as that of the famous Mountain Meadows massacre, etc., while Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders are hit off to the life.

It is the purpose of this book and of its companion volume (by the same author), "Political parties and party problems in the United States," to attempt an addition to the works designed for the encouragement of the study of American politics. This volume has to do with the original principles of the republic as announced by the fathers in the struggle for independence, and with the principal institutions and organs of government created by the constitution. In preparing his work the author acknowledges himself largely indebted to Bryce's "American commonwealth." He is professor of American history and politics, Indiana University.

"The book is a study of parties in America—of party history, party machinery, party morality, party problems. Party has always been the agency by which America has been governed, and therefore party politics is pre-eminently a subject that demands the constant attention of intelligent and patriotic citizens. The book is published in the hope that it may aid in promoting, in school and home, the study of American politics."—Preface.

This article endeavors to make clear the truth of two statements: (1) The general failure to reconstruct the method of the school in accord with the presuppositions and tendencies of modern philosophy is due to the pervasive influence of an erroneous conception of evolution in the theory of mental growth; (2) a right conception of the theory of evolution, active as the fundamental in a working hypothesis of education, would make the attitude of the teacher toward both the learner and the subject-matter scientific, and so bring the method of the school into harmony with modern thinking.

Zola, Emile. Truth [Vérite;] tr. by Earnest A. Vizetelly. N. Y., J: Lane, 1903. [F20.] c. 596 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The third in the group of novels called "The four evangelists" of which "Labor" and "Fruitfulness" were the first and second volumes. This is the last work from Zola's pen. The Dreyfus case figures in the present volume, or rather serves as the basis of one of the narratives unfolded in it. The work is really a powerful attack upon the Roman Catholic church, its teachings, influences, etc. It illustrates the keenly antagonistic condition of the Jesuitical and secular parties in modern France, instanced in the recent educational troubles.

O. cl., free to libraries; to other than libraries, cl., 50 c.; pap., 25 c.; or pts. 1 and 2, separately, cl., 25 c.; pap., 15 c.

In 1893 a "Catalog of A. L. A. library" was published, being the catalog of a library of 5000 volumes selected by an A. L. A. committee and exhibited at the World's Columbian Exposition. This catalog was without notes and necessarily incomplete. It has since then been the purpose of the A. L. A., the New York State Library and the Library of Congress to make good the deficiencies of the first volume by a completely new work, containing notes, etc., of a selected library to be shown at the St. Louis Exposition. The present catalog is the result. It contains 7520 volumes adapted to small libraries as well as large ones, and has been compiled in two distinct sections—one a class list according to the Decimal Classification, the other a Dictionary Catalog. There are also lists of abbreviations, publishers, etc., a synopsis of the Decimal Classification, and a synopsis of the Expansive Classification, and a subject index for the class list, while publisher and price are appended to each author entry in both lists.

Adams, Andy. A Texas matchmaker; il. by E. Boyd Smith. Bost., Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1904. [My.] c. 5+355 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Lance Lovelace, a pioneer Texas ranchman, is the matchmaker in the latest story, by the author of the "Log of a cowboy." Tom Quirk, the hero in the above story, is also the principal character in the present novel. The scene is Las Palomas, and Tom is supposed to recount his own adventures, after the vigorous fashion of a cowboy; he tells how he fell a prey to old Lovelace's matchmaking propensities, of his brief and stormy courtship and attempted elopement with its disastrous consequences, and other incidents of ranch life worthy of narration.

Adams, Ephraim Douglass. The influence of Grenville on Pitt's foreign policy, 1787-1798. Wash., D. C., Carnegie Institution of Washington, 1904. 79 p. O. (Carnegie Institution of Washington, Publication, no. 13. Papers of the Bureau of Historical Research.) pap., 50 c.

It is the purpose of this article, by means of the secret letters of Grenville, embodied in the "Dropmore manuscripts," recently published in England, and by facts given in the principal memoirs of the time to trace the development and extent of Grenville's influence in foreign policy up to the Napoleonic period. No attempt, however, is made to outline all of the important events of English diplomacy of the period. The references cited in the body of the work are arranged in the bibliography in alphabetical order, under the subtitle used in the footnotes. Bibliography (5 p.)

Divided into three parts. In pt. 1 the various sorts of protest, whether in the form of meetings, resolutions, or sermons, have been grouped in chronological order under the towns in which the action was taken, and the towns are arranged alphabetically. In pt. 2 the alphabetical order of towns is retained, and under each town name, the newspapers follow each other in the alphabetical order of their names, and the articles quoted from each in chronological order. Pt. 3 contains the relief measures and the petition. Indexes.

Adventures of Elizabeth in Rügen, by the author of "Elizabeth and her German garden." N. Y., Macmillan, 1904. c. '04. 5+299 p. map, D. cl., $1.50.

The author of "Elizabeth and her German garden" gives another chapter in her varied life. In the afternoon of a warm July day, she started with her maid and coachman to drive around Rügen, one of Germany's largest islands, lying in the Baltic Sea. Eleven days are spent in making the journey and visiting its queer summer resorts; every moment embraces some amusing incident, related with a quiet humor that is irresistible. There are unexpected encounters with other people, which make quite a story. The details of life at the primitive hotels are most graphic. The author's love of nature is again shown in her many enthusiastic descriptions. There is a map of the island.

Adventures of King James II. of England, by the author of "A life of Sir Kenelm Digby," "Rochester," etc.; with an introd. by F. A. Gasquet, D.D. N. Y., Longmans, Green & Co., 1904. 43+502 p. il. por. O. cl., *$4.80 net.

An attempt to demonstrate that the life of James II., who reigned as King of England only a little over two years (1685-1688), was not a failure, but that it should be judged by his exploits on land and sea, when as Duke of York, heir to the throne, he manifested bravery, calmness and unusual capacity.

Ailenroc, M. R., (pseud.) The White Castle of Louisiana. Louisville, Ky., J: P. Morton & Co., 1903. c. 7+264 p. il. D. cl., $1.25.

Although the story opens with a description of the brilliant court of the Second Empire, the principal incidents occur in the White Castle, Louisiana, notably the romantic love affair which runs through two generations. The Empress Eugenie, Napoleon, the Audubons and other celebrated characters are introduced with scenes of slave life which happened before the Civil War. Most of the events, however, occur in war times.

Albanesi, E. Maria. Susannah and one other. N. Y., McClure, Phillips & Co., 1904. [Mr.] c. '03, '04. 324 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel of modern English upper-class life. Susannah is a charmingly frank, unsophisticated young girl with a mother who is a passionate gambler and a sister who is a constitutional flirt. Her life is made miserable through their selfishness, but her own innocence and goodness carry her through.

Albee, Mrs. Helen Rickey. Abnákee rugs: a manual describing the Abnákee industry, the methods used, with instructions for dyeing. 2d ed. [Pequaket, N. H., Mrs. Helen R. Albee,] 1903. c. 60 p. D. pap., 60 c.

The abnákee rug is an improvement of the rug familiarly known in all New England rural districts as the hook rug; it was in the past constructed of the crudest colors and made after the most primitive designs. It's manufacture in the present artistic form is due to the author's awakening to the fact of her duty as an individual to the community; seeing possibilities in a commonplace object, she made it a means of social betterment and created at once a home industry and an artistic object.

G: C. Ish Kerioth: the story of a Bost., Morning Star Publishing 904. c. '03. 6+263 p. por. D. cl.,

(Man of Kerioth) is quoted as the probable Hebrew original of the Greek English Iscariot. In order to preserve the Jewish atmosphere of the story this form of the name is retained. The author's purpose is to interpret the character and motives of the traitor apostle. The events are presented from Judas' point of view according to the Gospels. The tale is founded on several years' study of the life of Judas as depicted by Biblical authorities.

Alden, Mrs. Cynthia Westover. Women's ways of earning money. N. Y., A. S. Barnes & Co., 1904. c. 3-278 p. S. (Woman's home lib., no. 1; ed. by Margaret E. Sangster.) cl., $1 net.

Mrs. Alden writes from a wide experience as a wage earner and a business woman of many responsibilities. Her connection with the press has also given her opportunities to learn of the many fields of woman's possible activities. The twenty-five chapters of her little book offer information about as many ways, for women to earn money, all presented with much practical advice and many pleasant anecdotes. The book is the first volume in "The woman's home library," and will soon be followed by "The mother's manual," by Dr. Coolidge, "Beauty through hygiene," by D. Walker, and other works.

Alden, Mrs. Isabella Macdonald, ["Pansy," pseud.] Dorris Farrand's vocation. Bost., Lothrop Publishing Co., [1904. My.] c. 5-335 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

Mrs Alden has drawn an interesting picture of a deeply religious, but very human girl, who seeks her vocation amid the social environment of college and church. She is helped in her quest by a fellow student, a youth of little cultivation, but high ideals, to whom she also gives much-needed help in matters pertaining to good taste and social deportment.

Aldrich, R: A guide to Parsifal: the music drama of Richard Wagner; its origin, story and music. Bost., Oliver Ditson Co., [1904.] c. 4-73 p. 1 il. D. cl., $1.

"An attempt to assemble, for the interest and guidance of listeners to 'Parsifal,' some of the most important facts about the sources, the origin, the characters and the poetical and musical structure of that work. The author acknowledges a special indebtedness to Maurice Kufferath's book on 'Parsifal,' to Hans von Wolzogen's 'Guide through the music of Parsifal,' in less measure to H. E. Krehbiel's 'Studies in the Wagnerian drama,' and to W. J. Henderson's biography of the master."—Preface. He has also used portions of his articles published in the New York Times.

Aldrich, T: Bailey. Judith of Bethulia: a tragedy. Bost., Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1904. [N.] c. 4+98 p. il. D. cl., $1 net.

This play is in part a dramatization of the author's narrative poem, "Judith and Holofernes." Though it contains lines and passages from the story, the drama is essentially a distinct work, dealing with characters, incidents, and situations not to be found in the poem. Judith is portrayed as a woman full of tenderness, mercy and refinement, but who is impelled by religious fervor and love of country to do a deed of great daring.

Ames, Jos. Sweetmen. Text-book of general physics for high schools and colleges. N. Y., Amer. Book Co., [1904.] c. 768 p. O. cl., $3.50.

This book was begun with the intention of having it serve as a revision of the "Theory of physics," written seven years ago. It was soon discovered, however, that this plan was not possible; and so the new book was written without any reference to the former one. The idea that guided the preparation of both are the same, however. The author still believes that the most important element in a course of instruction in physics is "a text-book which states the theory of the subject in a clear and logical manner so that recitations can be held on it."

"In presenting this manual to the public the author has had in mind the difficulty experienced by members of the bar and others who have occasional necessity for correct information on customs matters. Therefore, whenever sections of the Revised Statutes or other laws have been repealed or amended by subsequent legislation those portions have been omitted. If there is any doubt as to the repealing or effect of the amendments both laws have been incorporated. The notes to the customs administration act have been collected with great care and labor, and it is hoped that they will fill every want of the lawyer and merchant, as well as the government officer."—Preface.

The theme of the drama is the love of Tristan of Lyonesse, a celebrated knight of the Round Table, and Isolde, or "Iseult of the white hands," who was daughter of Gormun, King of Ireland, and wife of Mark, King of Cornwall. The time is a summer in the 7th century A.D. The scene opens in King Mark's castle Tintagel in Cornwall and later shifts to Lionel's Castle on the coast. Other characters who lived in the times of King Arthur play important parts in the tragedy.

Ashton, Mark. Azalim: a romance of old Judea. Bost., L. C. Page & Co., 1904. [Ap.] c. 5+335 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

Jezebel, Queen of Israel, who is represented in Biblical history as the personification of evil, is the principal character. The action of Azalim, a Hebrew shepherd, is in direct contrast to Jezebel's. The wily queen however subjugates the youth, and for her he forsakes the God of his fathers and becomes a votary at the altars of heathen deities. Vivid pictures are drawn of the hideous rites of Baal worship, with which the beauty and simplicity of the Hebrew ceremonials are also contrasted.

*Fessenden Abbott, the hero, was the heir to four hundred millions, accumulated by his father, a New York banker. Fessenden was brought up in ignorance of the great wealth awaiting him. From a child he lived in the Adirondacks, with a tutor who prepared him for Harvard. His father's aim was that he should be strong and healthy, and not a degenerate son of a millionaire. After college he learns of his father's millions, and goes with him to Europe. Here he forms a friendship with William II. of Germany, and loses his heart to a Grand Duchess of Austria. He has a plan to divide the world between the Kaiser and himself. Many other novel and dramatic incidents are found in the story.

Authoritative Christianity: the six synods of the undivided church, its only utterances, "those six councils which were allowed and received of all men," second part of the Church of England homily against peril or idolatry which is approved in its article XXXV. The third world council; that is the third council of the whole Christian world, east and west, which was held A.D. 431 at Ephesus in Asia. v. 2, which contains all of Acts II. to VI., inclusive, with matter between the acts; tr. by Ja. Chrystal. Jersey City, N. J., Ja. Chrystal, 1904. c. 19+472 p. O. cl., per v., $3.

The six synods of which Ephesus, A.D. 431, as named above, forms a part, are as follows: 1, Nicaea, A.D. 325. 2, I Constantinople, A.D. 381. 3, Ephesus, A.D. 431. 4, Chalcedon, A.D. 451. 5, II Constantinople, A.D. 553. 6, III Constantinople, A.D. 680. Mr. Chrystal has made the first translation of several of these volumes ever made into any modern language; the other volumes will be published according to subscriptions obtained. They are the only synods which Greeks, Latins and Anglicans, and some other Protestants agree in regarding as ecumenical and sound. They were once the basis of union of the Christian church, east and west before its division. Invaluable to students and theologians.

A young author, bored to death by his physician's fiat of three months' of rest, stumbles upon a bundle of letters in a hotel bureau drawer, and decides to follow the Phyllis to whom they are addressed. He goes from London to Lyons, Paris, Marseilles, Hong Kong, Bombay, Ceylon, etc., and finally finds Phyllis. Long days of travel follow, with much witty conversation, many misunderstandings and a general clearing up of mysteries. Good material and good use of it makes a bright story.

An English story, with its scenes among the fashionable set. It tells how Katherine Lavington, through her mother's influence is brought to marry Sir Henry Lorrimer, a middle-aged man who has made his money in trade. The Lavingtons were people of good birth, but poor. The marriage is not a happy one, and Katherine's good name suffers on account of her intimacy with a clever young Englishman with political aspirations. An accident deprives Sir Henry of his eyesight, making him dependent upon his wife's care and affection. This brings the couple together again.

"The Wampum Library of American literature" has been planned to include a series of uniform volumes, each of which shall deal with the development of a single literary species, tracing the evolution of this definite form here in the United States, and presenting in chronological sequence typical examples chosen from the writings of American authors. The editors of the several volumes provide critical introductions, in which they outline the history of the form as it has been evolved in the literature of the world. Each volume is complete in itself. The authors from whom selections are taken all were born in the first half of the 19th century.

"The eighteen stories in this volume have been chosen from the author's larger book, 'The horse fair,' with a thought of their educative value as well as for the intrinsic charm of the original narratives, which in various forms have delighted many generations of readers." All have a literary interest, connecting them with subjects with which every educated person is supposed to be familiar. In the first four the reader will be introduced to the sun and season myths of the Greeks and of our Norse ancestors. Following are stories of Pegasus and Griffin, of the mythical founding of Athens, of some of the romances of Charlemagne, etc.

In the principal characters, Gertrude Hemster, "A Chicago Princess," and Silas Hemster, a multi-millionaire, who had acquired a fortune by native shrewdness, the author of "A woman intervenes" satirizes well-known American types, bringing out their vain efforts to pander to royalty, and dwelling on the feminine desire to wed titles. The action is for the most part on board the Hemster yacht sailing in Chinese waters. The Emperor of Korea, an impecunious Englishman, and a demure lady's companion have noteworthy parts in a novel of mixed motives.

Mr. Barrett wrote a life of Lincoln in 1863 which went through many editions. The biography now offered is an entirely new work but it has the advantage of the contemporary point of view of the earlier life of the author combined with that of the matured judgment gained by years of study and the clearer insight afforded by the lapse of time. Mr. Barrett aims to represent with adequate completeness and in reasonable compass Lincoln's personal career, the leading historical events in which he took an important part and his best written and spoken words. He contributes much new and valuable material including unpublished letters of Lincoln, Chase and others, new anecdotes illustrative of Lincoln's character, and corrections of many errors of fact and inference that have gained general currency.

According to the introduction, the special needs of English-speaking people and those who have a fair knowledge of idioms have been kept in view. Minor distinctions of vowel sounds, especially those occasioned by the absence of accent have been ignored. Believing that the appearance of printed words should be left as free as possible from foreign or extraneous signs and characters, the most limited use of diacretics consistent with the representation of correct pronunciation of words has been made, and only those signs in general use have been given. By the author of "Handbook of pronunciation," "Synonyms."

been my endeavor to treat my subject in such a vein as to render the text interesting to those who may wish to acquire sufficiently accurate knowledge of old English and some French furniture in order that they may be able to distinguish one style from another, to apportion each to its proper period, and to learn something of the history of all without entering upon a very deep study of the questions involved."—Author's preface.

Bennett, C: E: Clarke. Caterer's pocket companion. New ed. Binghamton, N. Y., C: E: Clarke Bennett, [1904.] 190 p. S. pap., 10 c.

Benson, E: F: The Challoners. Phil., Lippincott, 1904. [Jl.] c. 3-345 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The author of "Dodo" under the above title writes a novel of English home life. The Challoners consisted of Helen and her twin brother Martin, and their father the Honorable and Reverend Sidney Challoner, who had lost his beautiful Italian wife when the twins were babies. His children are a great trial to Mr. Challoner, from the difference in their characters. Martin has a genius for music, and neglects his studies, failing to enter Cambridge. Helen is loved by a man who is an atheist, and whom she refuses to give up at her father's request. The story is well carried through, with plenty of bright dialogue.

Bentley, Rob. Thomson. Forestfield: a story of the old South. (In two periods.) N. Y., Grafton Press, 1904. c. '03. 7+365 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

A quiet story of the old south, and of the days of the Civil War as the south saw it. The first period covered by the story is from 1850-1856; the second period runs from 1861 to 1866. There is a prediction made at the end that an exodus of the negro race to Africa will occur in 1913, the fiftieth anniversary of Emancipation.

"Mammy" is a character creation somewhat in line with Mrs. Wiggs and Susan Clegg—a colored nurse from Virginia, who goes abroad with her master and mistress, and her golden haired little charge. The journey is mostly described in her words. Her philosophy and reflections in negro dialect about all she sees are extremely funny, beginning with a few days' sojourn at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, the sea voyage, and a visit in England to the most famous cities, the narrative ending with the coronation of King Edward.

Bierly, Willis Reed. Time and notice in practice; wherein acts are required to be done in law, their limitations, and the rules of exposition; embracing actions and procedure. Phil., Rees Welsh & Co., 1904. c. 8+478 p. sq. O. buckram, $4.50.

This work is devoted to two of the most essential elements in practice, viz.: Time and notice: the time prescribed when or within which the statute requires a thing to be done: and, when notice is requisite, how and when it shall be given. The many changes in our laws since the Constitution of 1874 was adopted challenge the closest scrutiny and comparison—by the practitioner. It is the purpose of this work to afford a ready reference to the statutes providing for time or notice—and the decisions thereon.

Bilse, Lieut., ["Fritz von der Kryburg," pseud.] A little garrison: a realistic novel of German army life of to-day; tr., ed. and with a special introd. by Wolf von Schierbrand. N. Y., F: A. Stokes Co., [1904. Ja.] c. 19+307 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

On a thread of story the author has strung a scathing arraignment of the workings of the German military system. His temerity has led to a six months' imprisonment and he has been dismissed from the German army. Zola's realistic picture of corruption in the French army given in "Le débâcle" almost pales before these descriptions of the wholesale abuse of power, the looseness of discipline, the army usurers, the money marriages, the debt-ridden officers, the hard drinking, the gambling for high stakes, etc., in the German army. The Kaiser himself has ordered an investigation of the author's charges.

Opens in the West Indies, where a young girl is living a happy life with her devoted, kindhearted father, who has no defined religious belief. On his deathbed he says to his child: "I have made a mistake. Make it the business of your life to find Jesus Christ." Circumstances take Evadne to the United States and among her fashionable guardians she begins the search her father had counselled. Her life became "a beautiful possibility" for helping others and showing professing Christians the life their faith must bring about if really understood and truly believed.

Black, Edith Ferguson. A princess in calico. Phil., Union Press, 1904. 4-140 p. D. cl., *75 c. net.
A story which pictures New England farm life, and also shows how drudgery may be made pleasant by the recognition of one's duties and the ready performance of them. The heroine, or as she is called "The princess in calico," is a character worthy of study, because of her winning personality, and her ability to conquer difficulties. An interesting incident in her career is a visit to Boston.

In one of the earliest caravan trains which wound its way across the state of Ohio could be found the young heroine of the story, Bonny Lesley. With her grandfather she was bound for the new territory, which was being opened up, to play her part in the struggles to establish a new home. Adversity was met by a strong determination to succeed, and although oftentimes the young girl felt that fate was against her, yet her perseverance and sterling qualities finally prevailed.

"This volume, both in matter and method, has grown out of many years' use of the discussions of these and similar topics in the Pedagogical Department of the University of Indiana, in the Michigan Normal College, before bodies of city teachers, and in institutes generally. It will be obvious to the reader that it is not a treatise upon methods of teaching. It concerns itself deeply with the educational process, and the materials for the derived science. The point of view is historical. . . . A brief but somewhat comprehensive bibliography of modern works is appended for the guidance of teachers in further reading."—Preface.

The story opens in the first years of the nineteenth century. A young midshipman in the U. S. Navy, after a short leave of absence, tries one dark and stormy night to reach his ship, the Essex, about to sail on a cruise for European waters. The Essex is lying in New York harbor, but the young middy in a small boat is blown out to sea and picked up by a British whaler and forced into the ship's service in the South Pacific. The whaler after a time is wrecked, the boy is rescued by another British whaler, which in its turn is captured. The book gives an accurate picture of life in the navy a hundred years ago.

In order to thoroughly study the immigration question from the Italian standpoint, Mr. Brandenburg and his wife first took up quarters in a New York Italian tenement house in Houston street, and frequented a basement restaurant of the better sort, where they learned to speak Italian. Then they went to Italy in the steerage of the Lahn and lived among the peasants of Rome, Sicily and Naples; afterwards coming back to New York as steerage passengers and going through Ellis Island as emigrants. The amount of information gathered is remarkable, throwing much light upon the subject generally.

Mr. Quixley is one of the most important characters in a novel that deals in mystery and attempted murder; there is a cleverly concocted plot, which involves an old man's fortune, a young man's and a young woman's happiness and a lawyer's honor. The scene alternates between a gloomy English manor, called in the story Gate House, and a cottage. A small servant and an eccentric bookseller are instrumental in bringing about the satisfactory ending of an old-fashioned courtship.

"The author has produced what is practically a church year book in which is told the origin, history and present status of each of the chief festivals of the entire Christian church, as well as of a number of local feasts and festivals which obtain in certain parts of Europe. While it is beyond the scope of the present work to attempt to tell the story of every one of the numerous canonized saints whom the church has chosen to honor, the author has each day throughout the year selected a few of the most noted among them and made brief sketches of the lives of those who are remembered on that day. But in the Alphabetical Index are given the names and saint-day of a far more comprehensive list; while in the general index will be found the names of those especially mentioned."—Publishers' Note.

"The younger Mrs. Courtney" was evidently created in fiction for the purpose of ventilating ideas about divorce, as she is the heroine in a novel which pictures the struggles of a woman who strives masterfully to uphold an ideal. When first introduced she is an ingenuous young heiress, who has just been inveighed into an ill advised marriage. Soon after her matrimonial venture she recognizes her mistake, but forces the idea from her and lives after the irreproachable manner described until fate intervenes in her behalf. The action of the erring husband leaves room for mental and moral deduction.

A young man just arrived at Keswick, a small town where he is to act as groomsman to an old friend, is by an odd chain of incidents brought into contact with the "Daughters of desperation" as three pretty young girls call themselves, who are amateur anarchists. They have a plot on hand to rob the very bride to whose wedding the hero is hastening of her silver wedding gifts. They are to be melted and given to the "cause." A most ridiculous succession of scenes ensues, the young man receiving their confidence, as he is thought to be a professional burglar sent to help them. Although fantastic, the story is told with much wit and sarcasm.

The carnation, according to the author, not only figured in plant-lore, but likewise in old English folk-lore as the gillyflower. He traces the history of certain species of the plant as far back as 1759 and describes the structure of many variations of the flower, which is also known as the dianthus. The information contained is founded largely on articles formerly published in the Gardener's Chronicle. The culture and habitation of carnations is considered, as is also the propagation of seed.

The two colonies which Penn is described as having founded are the West Jersey Colony and the Pennsylvania Colony. The rise, organization and slow development of these two colonies with their social and political conditions after the departure of Penn to England there to die, are very carefully studied and pictured. The analytic study of William Penn himself throws new light on his character and develops the fact that after all is said he was "a good man." Many portraits, facsimiles, etc., illustrate the book.

Burgess, Adelaide Maria. History of the willow pattern. [Brooklyn, A. M. Burgess, 1904.] c. unp. sq. S. pap., ribbon tied, 24 c.

Gives the origin of the famous willow pattern that graced the dishes of our grandmothers. According to the story, which is told in verse, the cottage depicted on the famous old pottery was the retreat of an eloping couple, whose spirits manifested themselves in the forms of two white doves, after their abode was burned by the bride's angry father; thereafter these harbingers of peace were seen as they are pictured on old platters hovering over the willow.

The English artist Sir Burne-Jones spent a year recently in this country, living chiefly in New York City, although he made visits to Newport, Boston, Washington, Chicago and other leading cities. Unlike most Englishmen who visit us he saw much to admire and commend—with some things also that honestly bear criticism. His work offers his impressions of life here among the richest and the poorest, and abounds in clever pen and pencil pictures (both his own). He gives his views of travel in our "rush" hours, the American child, ice-water, cocktails, hot steam pipes, winter in New York, the women in New York, our baths, telephones, food, society, etc., etc.

A gentleman farmer, on some of the downs of England that slope to the sea, is the yeoman. His brother, who has made a fortune in Australia, returns after thirty-five years and buys an immense estate, which offends the yeoman and finally unhinges his mind. Noble women and honest men are involved in a rather simple plot in which the yeoman's daughter plays a wise and effective part. The important family of the neighborhood is Catholic, and a broad-minded priest has much to do in making lasting peace in the family complications.

Canfield, Frances Dorothea. Corneille and Racine in England: a study of the English translations of the two Corneilles and Racine, with special reference to their presentation on the English stage. N. Y., published for the Columbia Univ. Press by Macmillan, 1904. [O5.] c. 11+295 p. D. cl., $1.50.
It was during the reign of Charles 1. that the first translation into English was made of Corneille's "Cid," probably due to the interest in the French drama aroused by Charles 1.'s French queen. But it was not until after the Restoration in 1660 that most of the plays of the two Corneilles and Racine were translated and produced on the English stage, attaining great popularity. The author makes a study of the various translations of these plays and tries to indicate the appreciable influence of such a movement on English drama.

Fergy the guide received $2 a day to haul his employer about into the secret places where the fish are known to be. When the fish refused to bite it was worth the money to hear the woodsman in modulated voice and in the dialect of the logging camp, drone on for hours about all the impossible adventures that had fallen to his share. Imagination ran riot, but many of the anecdotes spoke of knowledge of human and animal nature and a deep philosophy born of solitude and leisure. The marginal drawings bring out the humor of the text.

The great Micmac swamp of Nova Scotia dominates a story in which the actors are New York people, in camp for the summer. A clever young girl discovers a way of crossing the swamp, and so reaching their opposite neighbor, in place of going thirty miles around. Love is the chief theme, the story coming to a thrilling climax in the terrible swamp. Revenge also plays a part.

A plot of exceptional intricacy deals with people of the English nobility, who owing to old feuds, false accusations, murders, seeking for lost treasure, etc., spend time on the Breton coast, on English landed estates and in London. Hypnotism and mind reading and a play written to "catch the conscience of the king" bring about startling disclosures. The story begins in the early seventies as a prologue. A break of twenty-five years brings the characters to maturity. All is weird and often gruesome.

An unusual plot is the basis of "The transgression of Andrew Vane"; a plot that is scarcely explainable and is influenced by mesmerism. The hero, young Andrew Vane, finds himself in Paris in his twenty-first year, sent there for a rest, by his millionaire grandfather. His introduction to the American colony of Paris, and afterwards to the sights of Paris by a man who proves to be his evil genius, are scenes taken from real life, illustrating the thorough study Mr. Carryl has made of Parisian life. Young Vane becomes entangled in the meshes of the remarkable events of the prologue, and for the moment it looks as if he would be ruined. The ending is startling and original.

The first novel by the accomplished Parisian painter and illustrator. The story deals not only with the Parisian private and class atelier, the boulevard, the student restaurant, the circus and the often grotesque frequenters of the Quartier Latin, but also with the adventures of "kings in exile" (in this case a duke), and with a certain fascinating and heroic myth of one of the little countries bordering on the Adriatic.

A story of village life, which is interesting chiefly for character studies. Raymond Loftus is among the noteworthy types; he poses as a man with charitable motives, who has ever in view a pet scheme for founding an orphanage. On the execution of his plans much depends; the raising of funds, for instance, is a weighty consideration; also the collaboration of his fellow churchmen is desired; but Mr. Loftus braves all difficulties in his endeavors to win the honors due a philanthropist; his results offer opportunity for mental speculation, and cause the unceasing comment introduced.

The purpose of the authors has been to present an outline of the salient features of geology, as now developed, encumbered as little as possible by technicalities and details whose bearings on the general theme are unimportant. They believe the subject is best approached by a study of the forces and processes now in operation, and of the results which these forces and processes are now bringing about. These topics are presented in v. 1, and prepare the way for the study of the history of past ages, which is outlined in v. 2. The work is intended primarily for nature students, and is designed to furnish the basis for a year's work in the later part of the college course.

Chambers, Rob. W: In search of the unknown. N. Y., Harper, 1904. c. 5+286 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

The book opens in the Zoological Gardens in the Bronx. Professor Lesard of the reptilian department receives a letter from a man in the far north saying he is the possessor of two living auxs, a bird believed to be extinct. The professor's secretary is sent in pursuit of the man, with unlimited credit to buy the auxs. This is the beginning of several love stories, and other equally remarkable adventures "in search of the unknown."

The work done during the past few years by special investigators is one of the chief reasons for the preparation of this new history of the United States. It is the purpose to present, in a comprehensive and carefully proportioned narrative, an account of the beginnings of the national existence and of the successive stages in the evolution of our distinctive national qualities and institutions. The record covers the events from the beginning of the colonization of the continent in 1607 to the close of 1904. The history includes in addition to the record of political events, of the wars connected with these of the expansion of territory, and of the growth of population, carefully prepared studies of the development of the people in industry, in commerce, in education and in literature, etc. To be brought out in ten parts, each part sold separately.

Gives a clear and concise account of the scientific experiments carried on at New Haven in a study of the food requirements necessary to meet the true physiological needs of the body, under different conditions of life and activity. The aim has been to ascertain experimentally how far the dietary standards and customs which have gained general acceptance in most parts of the civilized world are scientifically correct, and how far they are at fault in meeting the daily needs of the body. The observations attending through many months were made upon three groups of men, representing different types and degrees of mental and physical activity.

"Richard Carvel" was based on the Colonial history of America. The theme of "The crossing" is largely the peaceful conquest of the great Louisiana territory by American citizens shortly after the Revolutionary war. The crossing of the Ohio River into this territory and the introduction of American social and political ideas into the Indian and French territory is worked into a story told in first person. A young boy, reared in the woods comes in contact with Daniel Boone, Rogers Clark, Andrew Jackson and many other historic characters. The fine characters among the men and women who settled our great west are worked into a story of ingenious plot.

Of the four essays comprised in this volume, two were originally delivered as addresses at Princeton University. The other two appeared first in the magazines. They deal with important events in our history that occurred in Mr. Cleveland's administration. They are entitled, "The independence of the executive," "The government in the Chicago strike of 1894," "The bond issues," "The Venezuelan boundary controversy."

Stories taken from American history, told in a fresh, picturesque style.

Cleveland, J: Poems of John Cleveland; annot. and correctly printed for the first time; with biographical and historical introds. by J: M. Berdan. N. Y., Grafton Press, [1904.] c. '03. 270 p. por. D. cl., *$1.50 net.

Mr. John M. Berdan, the editor, is a member of the Yale faculty. He contributes a thorough and exhaustive treatment of Cleveland's work and times as well as notes, references and explanation of the historical setting of the various poems. There has been much discussion as to the authenticity of many poems attributed to Cleveland, and Dr. Berdan has carefully investigated the older foreign collections as well as manuscripts, so that his edition may properly be designated as the final and most accurate work on the subject.

Cleveland, Treadwell F. A night with Alessandro: an episode in Florence under her last Medici; with three views in col. by Eliot Keen. N. Y., H: Holt & Co., 1904. [Ap.] c. 3+188 p. D. cl., †$1.25.

A gentleman adventurer of France with his body-servant comes to the Florentine Court in the last days of the Medicis. He is in the service of Charles v. and is a spy, aiming to discover the real sentiments of the Florentines towards their ruler. The whole story only occupies a single night, from dark to dawn, but it is full to overflowing with adventure.

"Further India" is the name given to Southeastern Asia, comprising Siam, Burma, French Indo-China and the Malay Peninsula. The author tells the story of exploration in this region examining the early allusions to those mythical lands contained in the works of writers of the first years of the Christian Era, giving the history of the Mediæval discoverers, of the East India Company and of latter-day travels and travellers. Extended descriptions of the country and the results of exploration are also included.

name, although it is admitted he is a prominent railroad man of New York. It was at the suggestion of a well-known literary man met on an ocean voyage that he dictated these amusing chapters from his own experience. Beginning with his life when a boy, he shows how by his own efforts he rose to positions of trust and finally became a railroad man. The book is rich in anecdotes that will especially appeal to railroad men.

Connolly, Ja. B. The Seiners. N. Y., Scribner, 1904. [My.] c. 6+314 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel, which is a new departure in sea-fiction, by the author of "Out of Gloucester," who has heretofore confined himself to the writing of short stories. The most interesting incidents occur aboard Gloucester "Seiners," or fishing boats, although Clancy's boarding house also figures in the story, and a sailor's love affair is almost as interesting as are his deeds of prowess. Another innovation is the presence of women characters who have never taken part in Mr. Connolly's other tales.

Conrad, Jos. Nostromo: a tale of the seaboard. N. Y., Harper, 1904. [N.] c. 3+631 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Novel of present-day adventure in a South American seacoast republic, where the odd contrast of great railroad and mining enterprises, side by side with mediæval revolutionary civilization, is set forth. Fighting and intrigue figure in the story; while the all-engrossing, soul-killing greed for money is portrayed in the characters and lives of two men—Charles Gould, the owner of the silver mine, and Nostromo, sailor and adventurer.

The heroine is a new creation in fiction, namely a kindly stepmother. The story of this marvellous woman, as told by herself, is in a decidedly humorous vein. The account of her courtship by a prosperous farmer, is followed by a description of a first meeting with her stepsons, and of her unique wedding and home coming to the farm. The quick perception and tactful management of "The second Mrs. Jim" will appeal to the male element especially, in brief many will long for her counterpart in real life.

Richard Le Gallienne met little Julia Cooley during the summer of 1901, while spending a few days with friends in the Connecticut valley. He afterwards learned to know her well, through her parents, and in direct relation with herself. His sketch of her which precedes her poems is consequently based on personal knowledge. He found her a natural, charming little girl, in no way precocious, who he thinks writes real poetry, which is quite remarkable for one of her tender years. Its chief characteristic is a love of nature.

A romance laid in rural England, with the rector of the parish and the lady of the manor as the chief characters. Wearied of society life in American and European cities, Miss Vancourt returns to her childhood's home where her advent is a great event in the quiet countryside. She soon arouses the enmity of her agent, whom she detects in disobedience and summarily dismisses. Later events give him an opportunity to retaliate, and as the result she is seriously injured. But an Italian surgeon and God's good man transform her future. The book contains also careful studies of rural character.

This, the initial volume of the new series, "The trail makers," embraces narratives which tell the story of one of the most remarkable explorations recorded in the annals of American history. Seventy-five years before the English succeeded in establishing themselves on the northeastern coast of North America a band of Spaniards, starting from what was already a populous and flourishing colony, at the City of Mexico, penetrated the opposite extreme of the continent, and explored thoroughly a region as extensive as the coast line of the United States from Maine to Georgia. The accounts of their experiences herein printed were all written by members of the expedition.

This story of the French and Indian war plays in the exquisite region around Lake George, Lake Champlain and the Canadian forests to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It begins in 1758 during the French and Indian war while Great Britain was slowly gaining ground. The storming of Fort Ticonderoga opens the tale which gives truthful and blood-stirring pictures of the times. Romance plays its part and an epilogue showing the descendants of those who fought and bled after 100 years in their handsome home on the Hudson River fitly rounds out an artistic story.

The author has been many years in the Far East and has been in the thick of the struggle since the breaking out of hostilities. He was war correspondent for the London Daily Chronicle from February to May. The rigid censorship made it impossible to send dispatches. He then wrote this book, of which the manuscript reached London October 25. It was hurried through the press and contains most valuable descriptive matter. The writer thinks Japan can now afford to stay on the defensive, and he rather thinks Russia will be inclined to end the war. His sympathies incline to the Japanese.

The author says in his Preface, "in this short volume it is impossible to give more than a general exposition of events, but I trust a sufficient explanation is herein given that virtue is not regarded alone on one side, and persecution on the other, but that the fanatic zeal of all classes of men was just as intolerant, just as unreasonable and just as un-Christian on one side as the other." He also says he has but one object and that to destroy intolerance, bigotry, and ignorance.

Jennie Sussex, the daughter of Sir Fortescue Sussex, the last baronet of his race, is the central figure of an English novel. Young, pretty and gifted, but poor, Jennie's struggle for existence begins early in life. Her love affairs are the chief theme. Three men wish to marry her, and she accepts the least desirable, only to give him up in a short time, finding he is deceiving her, to pledge herself to another man she has little affection for. All the characters transfer their love with equal celerity, three at least marrying in haste and not their first love. The dialogue is clever, the character sketching admirable, and the incidents unexpected. The odd title is taken from Job: "He beholdeth not the way of the vineyards."

By the author of "The country boy." The literary form of the present book is similar to that of "Letters from a self-made merchant to his son." Old Governor Bill Bradley, once a political power, has retired from the United States Senate to Brokenstraw Ranch, from which he sends periodical warnings to his friend and protege, Ned, back in the old district. The book is running over with political stories to illustrate the old Governor's points, graphically told in a rugged style.

"To chronicle briefly but comprehensively the endeavors and achievements of the Republican party during the half century of its existence now completed, to present a record of the causes and movements resulting in its formation, of its conventions and platforms, and of the measure of fulfillment secured for the promises made in those platforms, is the object of this work. A score of such volumes would not suffice to tell the complete political story of the past fifty years. . . . By the author of "Pigs in clover." The chief character in the novel is a young Frenchwoman, married to an Englishman, and the mother of two young children. Her husband having business to attend to, leaves her at a Continental watering place, where baccarat is played. She becomes infatuated with the game, and not only loses all the money he has left her to pay expense, but borrows more and sacrifices her own honor in her fright at the complications that surround her. The outcome is startling and unusual, and worked out with great power.

Tells the history of an Irish movement which sprang without leaders from the peasantry, namely the "Land League," which owed its origin to the efforts of the people to regain the land confiscated under the Cromwellian settlement. These struggles continued for a period of over 250 years. Character sketches of O'Connell, Parnell, and other celebrated Irish reformers are given. Anecdotes and legends bearing on the subject are also included. The great Irish famine in the early part of the 19th century, and its far reaching consequences, with other issues of the Irish question are discussed, as is also the action of the American Land League.

The characters in the novel are people who were famous in the time of the Louisiana purchase. Chief among these are Thomas Jefferson, Lewis and Clark the explorers, and the imposing figure of Black Hawk, Chief of the Sacs. Prominent Frenchmen who take part in the timely story are Napoleon and Talleyrand. The scenes are in St. Louis and France. The interest centres in the love affairs of a young American and a French girl of social rank.

North Hyben on the Hampshire coast, England, is the scene of the despotism of two brothers, who were the village blacksmiths. The elder of these selects a promising young farmer on whom he not only vents his own wrath, but he also strives to influence his fellow townsmen to join him in unjust persecution. When the hero's life becomes almost unbearable fate intervenes, and Nellie Brierly plays an important part in the episode of village life.

Forms a part of Colonel Dodge's "History of the origin and growth of the art of war," in which the work of four great captains has already been treated. Napoleonic bibliography comprises several thousand volumes, yet there is no one work in any language which goes into the military side of Napoleon's career as fully as the present volumes. Special attention has been given to the letters and orders written by Napoleon himself, and also to the statements of the original authorities from a geographical and topographical point of view. The maps are peculiarly serviceable in bringing before the eye the battles and campaigns described in the text. The first two volumes contain over 100 charts and maps, in addition to a valuable collection of some 130 portraits, including 14 of Napoleon, and more than 100 cuts of uniforms and arms of the period.

The Arikara traditions in this volume were collected during the year 1903, with funds provided by the Carnegie Institution. The work was part of a systematic and extended study of the mythology and ceremonies of the various tribes of the Caddoan stock. All of the tales here presented were secured through James R. Murie, of the Skidi band of Pawnees. The Arikara belong to the Caddoan linguistic stock, and were formerly allied with the Skidi band of Pawnee, from which tribe they separated in 1832.

During the administration of Jackson is the opening period of this story; it goes down to the great fire in Chicago. The "little girl" comes all the way to old Chicago from old Massachusetts, in a great covered wagon, with her father. She is a pretty, fair-haired girl of seven or eight, who knows no other home but Chicago for years to come. Through her eyes, and a young man's, her playfellow in her youthful days, and her lover in later days, we see the growth of the great western city, learn of its politics and other points of interest. The "little girl's" career is enlivened by a trip to Europe, and she comes back to see Chicago rise from its ruins, after the great fire.

Susan lived in Liddlehorn, in the early part of Queen Victoria's reign. She is introduced as Lady Barwell's maid. Susan's chief characteristic was frivolity; notwithstanding this weakness, she wins the heart of the village silversmith. Incidents of her rather tumultuous love story, and typical scenes of English village life are described in a novel which shows the attitude of both the Dissenter and the Churchman in the beginning of the Victorian era.

The entire nation of the Mound Builders is reviewed in this novel. Of course much had to be imagined or deduced from the structures left by them in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys; but again there is a strong historical element. Their traditions, their religion, their daily life, their final destruction are all presented vividly, in a connected story, delineating the power of envy, avarice, love and duty in no minor chord.

Until thirty years ago earthquakes were regarded as "formative geologic forces of nature, whose origin was mysterious, but which accomplished important structural results." Recent study and investigation by means of instruments which measure force and motions have made clear the fact that they are "pure effects of geologic forces . . . an electric vibration of the earth-mass." In the light of this "new science of seismology," Major Dutton treats of earthquakes in their various manifestations arising to bring them within the range of popular science.

"The new century history of the United States" was the last literary work of Edward Eggleston, whose purpose was to tell the story of our country as briefly as it was possible to do so without impairing the narrative. Mr. Eggleston particularly wished to preserve and present facts which described the life conditions of certain periods in United States history. The present work is a revised edition of the first draft of the author's finished manuscript made by G: Cary Eggleston.

There was work for all, the victors and the vanquished, when the close of the Civil War brought soldiering to an end. The hero of this book, a young Confederate officer, after the battle of Appomattox, pushes westward to Cairo, Ill., and there plays his part in the upbuilding of the West, showing unusual business sagacity and foresight. The author's intention is that this novel shall supplement his trilogy of war romances—"Dorothy South," "The master of Warlock," and "Evelyn Byrd."

Eggleston, G: Cary. Evelyn Byrd; il. by C: Copeland. Bost., Lothrop Publishing Co., 1904. c. 438 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

"Evelyn Byrd," is the third and last story in a trilogy of novels which deal with the action of the Virginians (men and women), in the Civil War. In it the author has endeavored to show the endurance and heroism displayed by the sons and daughters of Virginia in the latter part of the Rebellion. Some of the scenes are at Wyanoke. The interest centres in the love affair of Evelyn Byrd and Colonel Kilgariff. "Dorothy South" and "The master of Warlock" were the titles of the first and second books which preceded the present story, in the sequence of tales.

Eggleston, G: Cary. Running the river: a story of adventure and success. N. Y., A. S. Barnes & Co., 1904. c. 6–295 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

A story of life on the Mississippi in the early fifties when railroads were only in the making and this great river and its tributaries carried the commerce of the United States. Three brothers are called upon to support their father. They build and own boats and make a fortune out of a travelling store with which they go from town to town. Their sister proves most useful at all times and finally brings them all an inherited fortune.

William Greenleaf Eliot was born in 1811 in New Bedford, Mass. He had great earnestness and dignity and was a noticeable force among his companions. At the age of twenty-three he took up his life-work as the first exponent of Unitarian views west of the Mississippi. For twenty-nine years he was pastor of a church in St. Louis. The book gives a full account of the year of pestilence in 1849 and also describes the forming of the Western Sanitary Commission and its great work during the Civil War. Dr. Eliot fought all his life for the righteous life of the clergy.

King Philip, one of the greatest of his race, an Indian chieftain of many noble qualities is the "American king." The story turns upon the white man's cruel treatment of himself and his race, and the war that followed—known as King Philip's War. The leading characters are two boys of sixteen, one living in the New England colony of Plymouth, the other a new arrival from England. They face many perils together, their adventures running through the two other volumes that are to come of the series, of which this is the first.

Ellis, E: Sylvester. The Cromwell of Virginia: a story of Bacon's Rebellion. Phil., H: T. Coates & Co., 1904. c. 380 p. il. D. (Colonial ser., no. 2.) cl., $1.

A sequel to "An American king," which told of King Philip's War. The Cromwell of Virginia was Nathaniel Bacon, who led Bacon's Rebellion against Governor Berkeley, who for thirty years had tyrannized over Virginia and sacrificed all her interests to his abject devotion to the English king, and his personal indulgence and money-making. The same characters appear as in the former book. Bacon rose against authority, but he worked for liberty of religion and sacrificed himself for his devotion to Virginia.

A common sense treatment of a very romantic situation. The author apparently aims to show how ordinary people act under extraordinary conditions. One might consider the book a satire on the modern novelist. The plot has to deal with an escapade of the only daughter of a reigning European sovereign, who runs away to England with the unprincipled son of a German count, and her young brother, to avoid a distasteful marriage with an old man. A young Englishman, whose name is under a cloud, who is in the diplomatic service, is given the mission to find the princess and return her to her father.

Field, Roswell. Little Miss Dee. N. Y. and Chic., Revell, 1904. c. 7-241 p. 1 il. D. cl., $1.25.

Pathetic story of a little old maid whose life was one long self-sacrifice, first for her father, a visionary, obstinate man, next for an adopted son, who in return for devoted love, gave a careless selfish affection followed by neglect. A pretty love story is woven into the narrative.

Field, Walter Taylor. Rome. Bost., L. C. Page & Co., 1905, [1904. S.] c. 2 v., 9+306; 8+294 p. il. S. cl., $2.40 net.

Describes the really important things to be seen in Rome in the limits of a brief visit. It is not as barren as a guide book, nor as discursive as an essay, but is helpful in showing what is most worthy of appreciation in the most interesting city of the world. The first volume deals with natural scenery, monuments and architecture; the second chiefly with churches and galleries. Profusely illustrated with reprints of well-known paintings and sculpture.

An effort to explain the economic principles of nutrition according to the interpretation of the author, who founds his deductions on personal experiment. Under the first two letters of the alphabet, A and B, he classes the work assigned to man during the eating and digesting process; this he considers only a fractional part of the labor performed by nature, which assumes, he contends, the difference of the intervening letters from B to Z. The opinions of authorities on the subject are quoted, with the results of noted experiments. By the author of "Menticulture."

It was quite necessary that Lady Katharine Clare, who at the death of her mother inherits the title of the Countess of Claverley, should marry money. Claverley Castle was in a sad state of ruin, and its aristocratic inmates almost in a condition of destitution. The Claverleys are invited to make a visit at Ladyhall, the home of Lady Kate's rich godmother, and her dependent cousin, who acts as her secretary—handsome George Despard. The result of this visit and the means by which money is secured is related with a wealth of epigrammatic talk, such as we learned to admire in "Concerning Isabel Carnaby."

A story of old Japan and the imperial family of everal centuries back. Few of the heirs to the hrone in those days attained their majority, dying lowly of a mysterious sickness. The Regent of the ook, a crafty, cruel old man loath to resign his ower, found his match in one of his great captains, Kashima Daimyo, young and brave and equally am- itious. Their counterplotting results in the stealing f the baby emperor. His noble mother is a strik- ng figure and it is to her efforts that her son owes is return to his people. Beautiful descriptions of he country, and pictures of the life of the Imperial Palace, are features of a most poetically conceived ovel. Mrs. Fraser lived in Japan for some years, er husband having been British Minister in Tokio. She is an American, sister of F. Marion Crawford, nd author of "Letters from Japan."

A little New England city supposed to "look to Boston for supplies and to New York for fashions" is the scene of a story of an unscrupulous "promoter" who cannot rest with his financial success, but employs even more talent and energy to get into the inner circle of society. The result is a new rivalry with his defeated opponent in the local street railway deal. The love of money and the underhand methods of acquiring it lead to much unhappiness in the pretty, old historic town.

Aaron Zebi Friedman, the author of "Tub Taam," was formerly Schochet in the city of Slavisk, and Schochet and Rabbi in Bernkastle-on-the-Moselle. Later he came to New York where he taught shechitah (the Jewish method of slaughtering animals), and his seal was recognized by orthodox Hebrews. In 1866, the Society of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, through its president, Henry Bergh, declared the Jewish method of killing animals needlessly cruel; but Rabbi Friedman's able defense in "Tub Taam," convinced the society of an error of judgment. "Tub Taam" was originally published in Hebrew; it was translated into English by Prof. Buttenwieser in 1876.

About a year ago an article appeared in a New York daily entitled "The finding of the widow's mite through the spirit of Henry Ward Beecher." Mr. Funk claims that the narrative in many respects was erroneous, and gives the true story now, as he knew it, of this remarkable psychic fact, and also describes many other psychological phenomena that he has witnessed and helped investigate, during the past twenty-five years. The chief object of the work is to interest the public generally in the subject, and incite further investigation. A partial bibliography is given of spiritualistic and psychic literature. Index.

There is humor too in his recital, and fine character presentation, the book offering in its entirety a very thorough description of the customs and habits of the people of "the hermit isle."

The author has aimed to select from the extensive field of the law those fundamental principles, a knowledge of which the business man will most frequently find of value to him, and which the teacher of commercial law will regard most useful to his classes. It is not the purpose of this volume to make lawyers of its readers, but to teach them to discover the ways that lead from litigation, and to enable them to conduct their business dealings with an intelligent idea of their legal rights and limitations. The tabulations at the end of the volume give in a general way the statutes of the different states on several important topics.

Rome in the first century under Nero, with all its vice and barbaric luxury furnished the scene for the tender love story of a young Roman tribune and a Christian girl. The invincible progress and triumph of the Christian creed against all cruelty and persecution is the keynote. The great apostle St. Paul was specially hunted down by the favorite of Nero, who also strove to separate the lovers. The pastimes of Nero are gruesomely described. A learned physician represents the fearless study of the old and new doctrines.

Professor Gide's Principes d'Economie politique has gone through eight editions in the original French, and been translated into many other foreign languages. The first English translation was published in 1889. The changes made in the present edition are: the elimination of all distinctively French illustrative material, and the substitution of data from American sources quoted from the latest and most desirable authorities. Especially is this true in the discussion of protective tariffs, paper and metallic money, and the history of bank organization.

The author says he has not made an attempt "to brush the dust of ages from the early history of lace in the hope of contributing to the world's store of knowledge on the subject." His purpose, rather, has been "to present to those whose relation to lace is primarily a commercial one a compendium that may, perchance, in times of doubt, serve as a practical guide." The work is most interestingly illustrated with specimens of rare lace, and excellent descriptions are given of almost every kind of lace.

In point of historical importance Fernan Gonçalez ranks with the Cid. He is a half-fabulous Spanish hero of the 10th century, about whom the present poem was composed relating his adventures. The principal object of the present volume is the publication of a critical text of this old Spanish epic. The editor has had access to much new material, including unpublished fragments of the poem itself, and manuscripts of the various prose chronicles which used the poem. The volume includes, as an appendix, that portion of the chronicle of Alfonso the Wise, which deals with the material of the poem. The book contains an extensive introduction; the notes are literary, historical, and linguistic. The editorial work and the poem are in Spanish.

The characters are Anne Blythe, a charming widow, who will forfeit her husband's millions if she marries again; her uncle, Bishop Alston; Stuart Walford, an assistant rector in a fashionable New York church; Tom Yates, a coarse-fibered, warm-hearted lawyer; Newton, a retired physician and a zealous follower of science; and Blair Fleming, also a lawyer and a man whom the reader grows to admire more and more. The four younger men are seen at a Fifth Avenue club, where each gives his idea of heaven. Later all the characters meet in Florence, where Anne Blythe's love seems the only road to Paradise for each of them. The dialogue is clever and the thought very modern.

Professor Delitzsch in his famous lectures entitled "Babel und Bibel" which embodied a wealth of Assyriological knowledge, assailed the whole theory of Old Testament inspiration, showing that the book was composed in large and essential part of material drawn directly from Babylonian sources. Prof. Gunkel's reply, of course, upholds the inspiration of the Old Testament and points out many errors in Delitzsch's statements of facts.

Intended for young readers or for those who have not made an exhaustive study of literature. It is assumed, however, that well known authors like Shakespeare are familiar, hence no descriptive account accompanies his plays. The Victorian period is treated as a familiar epoch in literature and is dismissed with summary treatment. The authors represented are selected in accordance to their public fame.

Secchi's classification is regarded as an empirical one intended to serve only as a convenient means of grouping similar spectra; it is based on a personal examination of more than four thousand stars. Secchi's fourth type includes red stars which are too faint for detailed study. Accordingly a three prism spectograph has been used with a forty-two inch Yerkes telescope to photograph the spectra of a number of these stars. Includes discussions about the chemical origin of lines on certain photographs, and on the evolutions of stars; with tables.

"With the exception of the "Tar-baby" story and one other, all the folk-lore stories herein embodied are new, having come into my hands from various sources during the past ten years. The "Tar-baby" story has been thrown into a rhymed form for the purpose of presenting and preserving what seems to be the genuine version.—Author's note. All the stories are in simple rhyme, and each page framed with characteristic sketches. Many page pictures and marginal sketches, and a rich cover make this a handsome holiday volume.

Among the mountains and lakes of New England "Sweet Peggy" took care of her father's cows and helped her mother keep boarders. Mr. York, a rich New Yorker, has come into the region to cultivate his ancestral acres. Lying helpless in the woods with a sprained ankle, he hears a marvellous contralto singing the most intricate church music. Peggy helps him to her father's house and he thinks the great voice belongs to a mysterious boarder. Love finds the way and sweet Peggy is married for her own self alone, before her husband discovers that she has the soul-stirring voice. She becomes a public singer, but remains the same delight of her mountain home.

Constantinople, the capital of the Eastern Empire, in the tenth century is the historical setting of this tale of the crusade, derived, it is said, from mediæval Greek sources. Theophano, by intrigue and deception becomes the wife of a Roman emperor and wields a wicked power in the empire. The author is the leading Positivist of England.

Harrison, J. Kind hearts and coronets. N. Y., Benziger Bros., 1904. c. '03. 4-279 p. D. cl., $1.25.

A story of American life of to-day. Hugh Lindsay is summoned by his uncle Eric to the funeral of a cousin, who has been sole heir of that uncle's great possessions in South Carolina. There is much of the old world aristocratic despotism about uncle Eric, despite the fact that his American blood can be traced back for generations. He comes in contact, for the first time in his life, with a man who, while he is his nephew, is also the son of a woman whom he has despised because of her humble circumstances and her Catholic faith. And in this mother lies the keynote of the whole story.

Xaviera Pomeroy, a beautiful girl, gives up her musical career and worldly success after the death of her dearly-loved brother in order that she may devote herself to her father's sisters. But even in a secluded New England village complications arising out of her old life reappear and cause her great unhappiness before peace and security come to her. The story has a pronounced Catholic bias.

The author is minister of First Congregational church of Spencer, Mass. He studies Whittier as a reformer more than as artist or poet and dwells specially on his spiritual message that comforted and inspired human hearts. He points out that the only one motive behind all Whittier's work was to lift the fallen and right human wrongs. He thinks no one poet is oftener quoted than Whittier. He dwells upon his inner light, his optimism, his religion and humanity, his love of nature and his beliefs about the future life. Gives a true picture of the Quakers of the second quarter of the century.

A young architect, who has had a thorough training in Paris, comes to Chicago to begin his career. With high ideals and an artistic temperament, he comes to grief in his desire to make money quickly. His expenses are increased by marriage with a poor girl, while he feels he must live expensively to make friends and obtain orders. The struggle is too much for him and he succumbs to temptation in the shape of a corrupt contractor. He allows his plans to be tampered with, finally witnessing the destruction of one of his "fire proof" buildings, in which a number of people meet their death. The shock revives his conscience, and with his wife's help and influence, he goes back to first principles, begins again at the foot of the ladder, sharing the common lot, growing into a nobler and far different man.

In the beginning of the story the heroine is compared to a statuette which would have been perfect had it not been that a fan in the hands of the figure marred its artistic beauty. In the case of the real woman to whom this simile is applied physical attraction eclipses beauty of character, and like the fan of the statuette, conceals an ugly personality. After she suffers from facial disfigurement, her spiritual sense is awakened, and the reader will follow with interest the mental and moral processes of a woman created in fiction for a purpose.

Highroad (The): being the autobiography of an ambitious mother. Chic., H. S. Stone & Co., 1904. c. 289 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Born in West Virginia, in the ranks of what was called the "poor white trash" just before the Civil War, the author gives a graphic picture of the struggles of her early days and marriage to a man who was both a school teacher and a storekeeper. By slow degrees he wins a fortune, finally dying and leaving her a widow with four children. She goes with them to Europe, where she places her daughter in a convent, and then struggles alone for a social position. Her daughter's entrance into society and fine marriages are told in detail and with much humor.

Hillis, Newell Dwight. The quest of John Chapman: the story of a forgotten hero. N. Y., Macmillan, 1904. [N.] c. 13+349 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Founded on facts gathered from historical records, traditions and contemporaneous accounts, Dr. Hillis has woven this romance around the character of John Chapman. "Johnny Applesud," as he was called, first appeared on the Ohio in 1790, drifting down the river in a boat filled with fruit seeds, landing at intervals to plant orchards in advance of the coming of the settlers. For many years he followed his solitary self-appointed task, introducing fruit trees into Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois and other Middle West states. A thread of love story runs through this tale of heroic self-sacrifice, and there are excellent descriptions of pioneer life.

Such are the conditions which bring about the tragedy of four lives.

Holland, Annie J. Talitha cumi: a story of freedom through Christian science. Bost., Lee & Shepard, 1904. [N.] c. 3+417 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The story of a fine family, in which are five sisters, of whom one is regarded as hopelessly deformed. Through a loving friend's gift of "Science and Health" and kindly instruction, a wonderful change occurs, which brings joy to the household. The title will be recognized as appropriately taken from the words of the Saviour in healing the daughter of Jairus.

Holland, Clive. A Japanese romance; il. in cols. by Arthur G. Dove. N. Y., F: A. Stokes Co., [1904.] [O.] c. 4+338 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

An English artist, travelling in Japan, is bewitched with a pretty native girl, and impulsively marries her, only to find after a few months that his native land and a half-forgotten English girl call him back. But the little Japanese wife is an obstacle which only she herself is able to remove.

Designed to serve as a brief work of reference to which one may turn for information on the many business, legal or political relations of the day. The little book is in no sense to be regarded as an exposition of the law, nor, on the other hand, as an elaborate explanation of our system of govrnmnt. It has chapters on: National, state and city governments; Elections—qualifications of voters; Passports; Contracts; Bills, notes and checks; Partnerships; Corporations; Stocks and bonds; Insurance; Master and Servant; Landlord and tenant; Marriage and unmarried women's rights; Dogs, etc.

In this story Josiah Allen discovered that his farm had come into possession of the Allen family the same year of the Louisiana Purchase. Hence, Josiah thought it his duty and privilege to celebrate the Allen Purchase. He dwells so much upon his plans that the doctor advises his wife to take him to the St. Louis Exposition. They take a niece with them, who is impressionable and romantic and has numerous laughable adventures. "Samantha" describes, with her customary fidelity and eloquence, the wonders and glories of the great Exposition. She and Josiah meet many prominent people, and figure in numberless mirth provoking episodes.

The plot of the story turns upon a remarkable will left by Sandy McPherson, an old Scotchman, who leaves his money to Reginald Travers, the great-grandson of his first wife, and to Irene Burdick the great grand-daughter of his second wife, on condition that they marry each other. A cousin of Irene Burdick, of the same name, is pursuaded to personate the one named in the will, that the real Irene or "Rena" may test the affection of Reginald Travers. Many amusing and at times apparently serious complications ensue.

Howe, Frank W: Howe's handbook of parliamentary usage. N. Y., Hinds & Noble, [1904.] 54 p. nar. S. cl., 50 c.

The unique feature of this new handbook is an ingenious visual arrangement of the whole subject-matter of practical parliamentary law in such order that when the book is opened in the middle, the chairman, the speaker, the member who next has the floor, or any one else, has before his eyes a complete summary of every rule needed in the conduct of any business meeting. With the book opened in the middle, every leaf (from the top downwards) is trimmed shorter than the next leaf, so that the titles (motions) on twenty-six pages are visible at one glance.

These entertaining letters describe life in Rome from 1894 to 1900, during which time Mr. and Mrs. John Elliott ("Maud Howe") lived in an old palace near Rome, where Mr. Elliott painted some mural decorations he had received a commission for from the Boston Public Library. They met everybody in Rome worth meeting, "Maud Howe's" graphic delineations of the public men and fashionable leaders being most readable. She comes nearer the Romans in their every day life than any recent writer, the insight one gets of domestic service, cooking, rents, provisions, etc., etc., being full of value.

It was a long-cherished plan with Dr. Howe to write a minute account of the instruction given by him to Laura Bridgman, and the condition into which it brought her. But he never fulfilled this purpose. Dying in 1875, forty years after he had announced his intention of writing her story, the story has gone untold until the present. His daughters are the authors of this work, the material taken from the reports, notes, and correspondence of Dr. Howe, the school journals, and Laura's own writings.

The mid New-England latitude of Saxsmills is the stage. The son of Royal Langbrith, his mother, now wooed by the country doctor after nineteen years of widowhood, an opium eater and his loyal daughter are the leading characters. The son has grown up thinking his father a hero and benefactor and the mother knows he will never pardon a second marriage on her part. The doctor's courtship betrays the long hidden secrets of the father's life, and day by day the son learns that he has been worshipping a self-constructed idol. The contrast of the habits of the secluded little village and the ideals brought into it by modern college boys and journalists is skilfully described.

The Cumberland Road, built at last upon the ruins of both Washington's and Braddock's Roads from the Potomac River through classic Great Meadows to the Ohio River (1806-1850) is the most historic road used to-day in America. Perhaps no one road has played such an important part in our national history; "it carried thousands of population and millions of wealth into the West and, more than any other material structure in the land, served to harmonize and strengthen, if not to save, the Union."

The first chapter of the first volume presents an introduction to the two volumes of this series devoted to "Pioneer roads" and "Experiences of travelers." The evolution of American highways from Indian trail to macadamized road is described; the Lancaster turnpike, the first macadamized road in the United States, being taken as typical of roads of the latter sort. Next comes the experience of a noted traveler, Francis Baily, the eminent British astronomer, and the story of Zane's Trace from Virginia to Kentucky across Ohio, and its terminal, the famous Mayville Pike. There is also a chapter on Pioneer travel in Kentucky, by Judge James Hall, etc.

The "red window," which gives the story name, was, according to legend, used during the English Parliamentary wars to warn loyal cavaliers of danger; it was situated in a tower of an old manor house in the Essex Marshes. In the present novel the window was to have been used as a signal that the owner of the old hall had forgiven the heir, whom he had disinherited in anger. A relative, however, with designs on the estate, uses it as a means of luring the heir into a trap; almost all the characters, notably the heroine, are concerned in proving his innocence and in unravelling the mystery which thwarts even skilful detectives.

Hume, Fergus W. The yellow holly. N. Y., G: W. Dillingham Co., [1904.] 3-359 p. D. cl., †$1.25.

The author of "A coin of Edward VII." and "The mystery of a hansom cab" has written another detective story of brilliant adventure in London. The mysterious murder of a middle aged woman, keeping a respectable boarding house, and apparently without an enemy, is the starting point of the story. It is worked out with much ingenuity, the woman's life being gradually uncovered, showing that in her own career murder had not been unfamiliar. A sprig of yellow holly is the innocent cause in both cases of discovering the murderer.

A narrative of adventure founded on an incident of West Indian history. The young hero is an English midshipman, and the other characters are mostly naval men. Diamond Rock is a real rock in the ocean off the coast of Martinique. In 1802-03 the English fleet, under Commodore Hood, was blockading this French island, and, as an adjunct to the blockade, Hood seized and fortified the rock, which was put in commission as a sloop-of-war. This historical incident is the framework of a boy's adventures—a boy who has a tendency to get into scrapes.

I: in which a woman tells the truth about herself. N. Y., Appleton, 1904. 4+363 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
A novel which is told in the first person. When introduced the heroine is an undeveloped girl who has been made to feel her own insignificance in a rather unpleasant way. Born of this awakening is a determination to create a career for herself; thereafter her movements are studied, and she gives careful consideration to dress and the accessories of the toilet, and notwithstanding she is married, becomes a finished coquette. This with other incidents of her vain and unwise course are faithfully described and analyzed, for the evident purpose of showing by contrast the difference in the later self which she depicts in the light of a new mental, moral and physical development.

May Irwin, the well-known actress, has been devoting some of her spare time, since her temporary retirement from the stage, in compiling a cook-book. During her years of travel over the country she has collected many choice recipes from reticent chefs and head-waiters and from generous friends. These she has gathered together and issued in book form. On one page of the book comes a recipe, surrounded by numerous illustrations in pen and ink. On the page backing this is some witty aphorism, either selected or one that has been used by Miss Irwin on the stage.

The name which gives title to the book stands for a great American detective. The story of whic Mr. Oakes is the hero is told by Rodney Stone, a New York lawyer. He and another friend go with Oakes to Maine to solve the mysteries of an old colonial mansion. The tragic doings which have been enacted there had baffled the keenest brains, and at the time that the story opens had become so serious, that the estate, once so valuable, had been deserted by the heirs. The detective successfully unravels the secrets of the place in a most dramatic manner.

Jackson, Margaret Doyle. The horse-leech's daughter. Bost., Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1904. [Mr.] c. 5+349 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel which deals with several phases of American social life, especially as it is in evidence in New York. Although the characters are diverse, hey invite study; notably the woman whose insatiable greed for money causes her to be classed with "The horse leech's daughters," who incessantly cried, give, give." A generous husband and a sympathetic friend are also caught in the meshes of fashion's whirlpool, and the conventional villain figures in several roles.

Dialstone Lane was in the little English town of Binchester. Here a retired sea captain and his niece had taken a furnished house. They soon make acquaintance and their attractive home becomes the meeting place of many odd characters. One day Captain Bowes tells a remarkable story of a bag of precious stones buried under a dead man in an island in the Pacific Ocean. His story spreads and creates excitement, a number of men clubbing together to buy a ship to go in search of the treasure. The story is a decidedly humorous one, the ending not being at all what is expected.

The betrothal and marriage of a charming American girl, the daughter of a many times millionaire, to a handsome, attractive, but impoverished Italian Prince, with a long line of ancestors, is the leading event. The story has its scene in England—mostly in London—English, Italian and American types being strongly contrasted. There is an undercurrent of intrigue and a resulting pathos in the heroine's story through the fact that the Prince had once loved and been loved in return by his bethrothed's dearest friend, also a beautiful American, but without the worldly goods necessary to make a marriage with her by the Prince desirable from his point of view.

"Tinker" is a nickname bestowed upon the youthful son of an English baronet in reduced circumstances. The little fellow begins life under pitiful conditions—is stolen and ill treated, and found by his father in a miserable condition. Love and kindness make another boy of him and in time he shows himself rich in fun and the desire for adventure. He runs away with a flying machine, commandeers an automobile, usurps the captaincy of a steam yacht, rescues a kidnapped child, saves a lady from Italian brigands, adopts a sister, marries off his father—and these are only a few of his astounding escapades.

"Tommy" was a waif, whether boy or girl was at first unknown, who strayed into the rooms of Mr Peter Hope, literary hack of London, and volunteered for "grub, a shake-down and, say, sixpence a week," to be his housekeeper. Sharp-witted child of the street, she soon developed under her adopted father's care and love considerable journalistic ability and became an important little figure in the literary Bohemia in the midst of which she grew up and came into her woman's heritage. The story is told with whimsical humor and clever character sketching.

A recent visit through the rarely trodden byways of the South furnishes material for the present volume. Every state was visited east of the Mississippi Valley and the home life of the poor whites and equally poor negroes carefully studied. Especially does the writer consider the relations of the negro with the whites, his present condition compared with the days of slavery, etc. A great many amusing dialect stories are entertaining features of the book. Handsomely gotten up and profusely illustrated for the holiday season.

Johnston, Rev. J: Wesley, ["Annan Dale," pseud.] The mystery of Miriam. Bost., Herbert B. Turner & Co., 1904. [My.] c. 7+459 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
A young New York clerk by force of circumstances becomes confidential secretary to his employer, rescues him from burglars, booms his business and—falls in love with his daughter. This leads to his banishment to Hong Kong and dismissal. The daughter fails in health, the marriage is consummated and the young wife dies. Now begins a complicated story of occultism. Under another name the hero meets a girl, the prototype of the wife he has lost, who was born on the same day and moment and who is instrumental in straightening out very involved business and family matters.

captain of the good ship Cygnet, one of a fleet of vessels that sails away, with a wildly enthusiastic crew, bent upon fighting the Spanish in the Indies. Sir Mortimer is a brilliant figure—young, handsome, brave, and loved by one of Elizabeth's maids of honor. When the story opens he seems to have all that is good in life at his beck. Treachery ruins his career, and for years he languishes in a Spanish prison. How his honor is cleared of all stain, and he is given back to his love, is related with much spirit and color. Sir Francis Drake, Raleigh and Sir Philip Sidney are introduced.

Jones, Alice. Gabriel Praed's castle. Bost., Herbert B. Turner & Co., 1904. [S.] c. 5-380 p. D. cl., $1.50.

A novel which deals with phases of life in the art studios of Paris. The characters are Garvie and Thorpe, artists; Virginie Lapierre, a model; Britski, who poses as a patron of art; Britski's wife, supposed to be a fashionable modiste; and Gabriel Praed, who, with an unsophisticated daughter, is travelling on the Continent. The scenes are in Fontainebleau, the Latin Quarter, Paris, and Rosbraz. The interest centres in the scheming of the Britskis, who try to dupe Gabriel Praed into buying a château, which they represent as an ancient castle, also in the unconventional action of his daughter and her romance.

The author of this work and of "The ideals of the East" was born in Japan in the year 1863. He is a man of broad culture, his work having been written in English. In 1886 he was sent by Japan to America and Europe as a commissioner to report on western art education. On returning he organized the Imperial Art School of Tokio, of which he was made director. In the present book the author declares that there is no "yellow peril," that the empire, though warlike, stands not for aggression but for peace! He sketches the entire history of the country, but dwells particularly upon modern events and developments, etc.

The first part of this volume is a revision of the paper prepared by the author for the celebration of the centennial of the adoption of the Constitution in 1889. It gives an account of the conditions existing at the close of the Revolutionary War, shows the weakness of the old Articles of Confederation, and traces the successive steps by which the patriot leaders brought the States to agree upon a general convention. Then it presents the main points of the debate by which the several sections of the Constitution were finally shaped and settled. The second part contains an account of the Monroe Declaration of 1823 and a study of the Monroe doctrine as time and events have developed it.

The purpose in telling the sad life story of a woman of very high ideals and irreproachable morals, is to illustrate the effect of divorce on the children involved, an issue of the question very seldom considered. The husband in the case is seemingly an exemplary man, who suppresses conscience, and makes a motion for divorce. The decree granted, the pair realize through their own suffering what they have unwittingly brought on their only boy. The action of both thereafter is unusual.

"Several important changes have been introduced in the present edition, chiefly in connection with the igneous rocks. The composition of the minerals entering into them has been more fully stated, graphic formulas being employed where they seemed desirable. . . . In the description of textures and their development much greater stress is laid than formerly upon the geological occurrence of the rock masses."—Preface. A chapter has been added and the Glossary brought up to date.

"While this work aims to do three things, (1) to rearrange the writings of the Old Testament in a logical order, (2) to indicate their approximate dates and the classes of writers from which they come, and the more important reasons for the critical analysis of the different books, and (3) to introduce the reader by means of a clear translation to the beauty and thought of the original, it also seeks by occasional interpretative notes upon obscure passages and by titles and brief side-headings, to make clear the thought of each section and the logical relations of the parts to the whole. Brief suggestions are sometimes offered regarding the vital significance and value of certain stories, but the supremely important task of deriving from them their practical teachings and of applying them to life is left to the teacher and individual reader."—Preface.

The author says in his preface: "I propose to inquire what some great literary luminaries have done, and to show in some instances what were better left undone, for the enlightenment of mankind. And in this retrospect we will observe the acknowledged Titans engaged in Herculean labors to establish truths which, in the nature of things and of mind, are either self-evident or improbable. We will observe minds which have given the world some of the most superb thought, grouping the rarest gems in clusters with the veriest peter-funk. We will behold exhibitions of power out of all proportion with principle, in many instances entirely without it—but occasionally we will be refreshed with an instance in which the renown of the author is not the soul of his effort, and his profit is not its stimulus."

Effort is made to show by analysis and comparison and a study of evidences the influence of Dante on English poetry. The first resemblance in English verse to the "Divine comedy" is said to exist in the poems of Chaucer, and the opinions of English and German scholars are quoted in support of this theory. After Chaucer, Milton is studied in relation to the subject, the effect of Dante in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is also shown, and master poets such as Byron, Shelley, Matthew Arnold, Rossetti, Browning and Tennyson are represented as having been deeply impressed by the writings of the Italian poet.

Labriola, Antonio. Essays on the materialistic conception of history; tr. by C: H. Kerr. Chic., C: H. Kerr & Co., 1904. c. '03. 246 p. D. cl., $1.

The author is professor in the University of Rome. His book is thought to be the most important contribution to the literature of international socialism since Marx's "Capital." The first part, "In memory of the manifesto," is a concise study of the historical causes which made possible the writing and publishing of the Communist Manifesto in 1848. The second and longer portion of the book consists of an essay entitled "Historical materialism." This is the brief and convenient name given by F: Engels to the central principle of socialism. In this essay Labriola explains in detail and with many illustrations "historical materialism."

A love story which is told in a series of letters supposed to be the correspondence of two journalists of the opposite sex, who sign themselves Daphne and Lad. The first letters contain graceful compliments, and give the impressions of both writers on current events, and topics of the day with descriptions of their modes of life. These are followed by expressions of love, an unexpected revelation, and a final letter of renunciation. Ample opportunities are offered in the unique correspondence for the study of motives.

"The gems of the east" are the least known and the most remarkable islands of the Philippines. Mr. Landor journeyed several thousand miles through the Philippines, going into districts and islands never before visited by white men. He says by way of introduction to his reader: "I will take you to romantic volcanic islands, and to the stronghold of the Celebes Sea pirates; we will visit the fanatical Mohammedan tribes of both the Sulu Archipelago and Mindanao; we will accompany the Americans in a war against the Moros; we will call on the insurgents (or 'ladrones') and I will introduce you to the extraordinary white tribes of tree-dwellers, and the negritos; also to a multitude of other tribes whose sins extend no further than cannibalism." Two or three thousand photographs taken during the trip serve as the material from which the illustrations are made.

Lane, Elinor Macartney. Nancy Stair: a novel. N. Y., Appleton, 1904. 10+385 p. D. cl., $1.50.
Nancy Stair, as described by the author of "The mills of God," is one of the most charming characters in recent fiction. According to the story, which is supposed to have been told by her father, Lord of Stair, Nancy was a poetess, whose verses were favorably commented upon by Robert Burns and Mrs. Opie; Lord Stair, however, values his daughter's beauty of character more than either the mental attainments or physical beauty for which she was renowned. Interesting incidents of Nancy's history are her courtship and marriage. Nancy's mother's love story is also told, and for a while murder lends a gruesome interest. The time is from 1768-1788.

"This book," the author says, "is the result of a vast research, some of it along new and original lines." He claims that part one contains A new theory of life; A new theory of the formation of the solar system; A new theory of geological dates; it points out the place where primitive man originated, gives the cause for his development, etc.; classifies and divides man into four races, with four languages and four colors. In pt. 2, by tracing ideas to the spot of their origin, a new conception of ancient history is unfolded, and a large amount of information lost sight of for more than 3000 years is disclosed.

Charles de Langlade, born in 1729 at Old Mackinaw in northern Michigan, was a brave soldier and sturdy pioneer, a matchless leader of Indian bands, loved and trusted and respected by the savages who hailed him as "The Bravest of the Brave." Settling with his father at the town now known as Green Bay, he became the founder of Wisconsin. He led the Northwest tribes to the defence of Duquesne when Braddock was killed, and he fought with Montcalm's forces against the English, and later commanded his Indians in their attack on St. Louis. This is the man whose life story is told by Mr. Lawson against the historical background of colonial days.

"I have endeavored in this book to set forth the following views: That men and women are, in strict accordance with the opinion of the most recent physiologists, radically different as regards both body and mind, although social or domestic life has given them much in common. That in proportion to the female organs remaining in man, and the male in woman, there exists also in each just so much of their peculiar mental characteristics. That this female mind in man, having free access to the images stored in the cells of memory, calls them forth in dreams and reveries, the same being true as regards the masculine mind in woman."—Preface. This book was finished only a few months before Mr. Leland's death.

"The closed book" is the ancient record of one Godfrey Lovel, an English mercenary in the service of Lucrezia Borgia. This old manuscript, besides vindicating the lady of the Borgias at the expense of her brother and father, reveals the English hiding place of the lost Borgia jewels and of the famous Borgia poison, whose secret was lost to the world after the Borgias' deaths, but which during their lives enabled the family to attain almost supreme power. The book is really a vindication of the much abused Lucrezia Borgia, who, it seems, was simply the victim of circumstances.

Letters which never reached him. N. Y., Dutton, 1904. 3+302 p. D. cl., $1.50.

"The letters which never reached him" were addressed to an American who was killed in the Chinese Boxer attack at Pekin. They are dated from August, 1899, to August, 1900. The writer, whose name is withheld, is likewise an American. Her letters are largely descriptions of the persons she came in contact with and the events of her life while travelling on the Continent. They contain also her personal impressions of the topics of the day and were evidently written for a very dear friend. Although the correspondence was originally published in German, the present edition is not a translation, but was rewritten in English by the author, who is now dead. The volume is a memorial.

Mr. Leupp states at the beginning that his book is not a biography. All that he claims to have attempted he says is "an unpretentious portrait sketch of a man as he has revealed himself to me not only under the lights of an exceptionally brilliant public career, but by a long period of pretty close personal contact." Mr. Leupp, a trained newspaper man, for years the Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post, tells his story fearlessly and frankly, and with a wealth of anecdote. Nineteen chapters are devoted to various personal traits of the President, to climaxes in his career, and to his many sided mentality. Details are given of many misrepresented events in his career, which make over history.

Litchfield, Grace Denio. The letter D. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1904. [S.] c. 5+322 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The story takes place in a prosperous elm-shaded American town. Two close friends, partners in a law firm, each write a novel, one to win the girl who has promised to be his when he has achieved a name by his own efforts, the other, fired by true genius and inspired by the presence of the same girl. The latter is injured by a train and totally loses his memory. His friend, in possession of the manuscript, publishes his story, signed with the letter "D" and for a time achieves reputation throughout the land. A close psychological study of motives and characters, and the unexpected conclusion give originality to the romance.

Litchfield, Grace Denio. Vita: a drama. Bost., R: G. Badger, 1904. c. 56 p. D. cl., $1.25.

The drama is supposed to be enacted in the Palace of Time, the guardian of Truth. Vita, daughter of Time is the heroine. Happiness, Faith, Care and Malice are her attendants. Hope the sorceress is also a personage in the dramatic poem, which is virtually a travesty on human life.

Wolf Larsen, captain of a Pacific sealing schooner, is a man of huge brute strength, acute mind, self-trained by reading, but utterly cruel and relentless. In coming out of the San Francisco harbor he rescues a drowning man whom he then impresses into service. The castaway is Humphrey van Weyden, a wealthy young litterateur, who under the stern discipline of ship life, terrorized by the Wolf, develops into a resourceful, reliant man, able to cope with circumstances when Maud Brewster appears, having been picked up from a boat in the open sea. Love and adventure follow close upon each other, even including life on a desert island.

Prof. Lounsbury's assertion "that there never has been and never can be an undisputed standard of pronunciation for our language" will be a severe blow to the many authorities on the subject. His treatise is most entertainingly written, and illustrated with a number of words whose pronunciation has been a matter of dispute. He is Professor of English in Yale University, and author of "Studies in Chaucer."

The author says "the purposes of the story are, in brief: A plea for co-education, as opposed to the herding together of the sexes in academies and convents; to show the utter futility of ignorance and innocence as safeguards of virtue; to condemn the pernicious chaperone system which robs a girl of self-reliance and serves to whet the appetite for the forbidden; and to thrust, though indirectly, at society's practice of condemning in the woman what it condones in the man."

The scene of the poems, the author explains, is Pike County, Missouri; this explanation is offered to prevent the confounding of the Pike immortalized in the present book with the county in Illinois described in Secretary Hay's "Pike county ballads." Mr. Love also claims that Pike in Missouri has been made the most famous county in the United States by a refrain of the song "Joe Bowers," from which he takes the title. The other verses depict rural life in Missouri. Dedicated to Pike Colony in St. Louis, (Louisiana Purchase Exposition.)

Richard Gresham is chiefly interesting as a character study. His mental and moral development begins when he is nine years old. At this period in his life he is suddenly confronted with the fact that his father has deserted his family; after this Richard's lines are cast in unpleasant places; he becomes a farm drudge and is forced to endure the cruelties that are detailed until fate intervenes and he is seen as a hero and lover.

The writer, who is a Frenchwoman by birth, although she has lived twenty-five years in this country, says, "This is not a book for restaurants, hotels, or people who can afford a chef. Most Americans have formed their ideas of French cooking from hotels, restaurants, or formal dinners, and have never known the home cooking which is more simple and more wholesome. It is also less complicated, as it would be next to impossible to prepare for a small family the dishes which are done daily in a large establishment. . . . The recipes which I will give are used in well-to-do families and constitute what is called in French the "bonne cuisine bourgeoise."

A novel which shows the attitude of the public to the much berated railroad corporations and to the railway magnates. Special consideration is given to the machinations of professional politicians and bushwhackers, who are the "Grafters" in the story. By a comparison of the method of these men, readers are evidently expected to form their own conclusions about both sides of a vexed question. A young lawyer plays a remarkable part in the exposé of the political schemers, who appear to be real characters with fictitious names, and likewise in the life of the heroine.

Little Marjorie Fleming was born just one hundred years ago in the old-fashioned Scottish town of Kirkcaldy, on the northern shore of the Firth of Forth. Her brief span of life only covered nine years. She had strong opinions on religion and other matters, when not more than a baby, which she confided to diaries and letters, which are most delicious reading. Sir Walter Scott loved the child dearly, and Dr. John Brown of "Tom Brown at Rugby" fame, wrote a charming biography of her fifty years ago. This is included in the present volume, with her journals and letters and other matter, many portraits, etc.

That it was at least "the day of the dog" is proven in the story, which is notable for a mixture of humorous and romantic incidents, in which Swallow, a savage bull-dog, plays an important and characteristic part. The first scene is in a barn in a small town near Chicago; a lawyer in search of a fair client wanders into this barn, and later chance throws the client in his path. Swallow however holds sway, and the several uneasy hours spent by lawyer and client with Swallow's antics and their consequences are worthy of description.

A blank-book, bound in white leatherette, intended to keep a record of all the details of a funeral. Every page is headed by a verse of Scripture or of a poet. This rather ghastly memorial includes the remarks of officiating clergyman, list of bearers, floral offerings, names of donors, calls of condolence, obituary notices, letters of condolence, etc.

The scene is Washington. The hero, who figures in the novel as Robert Warburton, decides to play a trick on his sister, hence, after the Embassy ball he assumes the garb of a groom, and mounting the box of a coach which he believes contains his sister, prepares to drive her home; before he arrives at his journey's end he discovers he is riding on a strange carriage, the occupant of which likewise makes a discovery, and hands the would-be jehu over to the police court. Warburton's adventures there-after are interesting. The novel is apparently found-ed on the dilemma of a real man, supposed to be closely connected with diplomatic circles.

He becomes an artist and marries Margaret North, a woman "not too good for human nature's daily food." As years go by her husband becomes more and more visionary and altruistic and fails to inspire his wife to sympathize with him. Their totally different natures lead to the consequences that make the plot.

Mackaye, Harold Steele. The panchronicon. N. Y., Scribner, 1904. c. 4+350 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel somewhat after the style of Richard Stockton's wild imaginings. "The panchronicon" is an aerial machine, invented by a New Hampshire man in 1898. By flying westward at a higher rate of speed than that of the earth's diurnal revolution, it would, of course, enter the past, so says the inventor. With a couple of New England women, Copernicus Droop, the inventor, starts on a voyage, bringing up finally in England in the reign of Elizabeth. The court of Elizabeth confronting the phonograph, the bicycle, and the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy is very funny.

The Moses Brown of this interesting narrative was one of the great privateer captains who sailed from Newburyport in the Revolution. He was the hero of two important battles fought at this period, which have never before been described in any history to Mr. Maclay's knowledge. He now tells the history of them in most vivid style. Brown was captain of the General Arnold, a regularly commissioned American war-ship. Both actions in which his ship was a winner took place within a short distance of the coast of Portugal in 1779. Captain Brown afterwards served many years in the U. S. N., and was captain of the first Merrimack.

A story of the wild moors of West Cornwall, near Land's End, England. Genevra is a girl of twenty-nine who lives with her brother and his wife in an old deserted castle of the Norman Conquest, where they all almost starve as independent farmers. Genevra writes poetry of a wild natural kind, dealing wholly with elemental emotions. A lodger, an artist, comes as boarder, a most unpromising character, but Genevra loves at once for the first time, although she is under promise to marry a suitor to help her brother out of his troubles. Both the lovers have volcanic temperaments and the course of true love is not smooth.

The author will be remembered as the New York Journal's war correspondent, who was almost fatally wounded during the Cuban campaign. He has given here a thrilling story of adventure, the scene shifting from South Africa to London, and coming to a dramatic climax on Cape Cod. The hero comes to England with a large fortune in uncut diamonds. His mother whom he has come to visit, dies suddenly, and there are complications about her will and his bag of diamonds which he has assigned to her. He is about losing his property when he takes his gems and escapes from the London police. This is the beginning of a long chase and many exciting scenes.

The early chapters show Tony Stretton and his young wife chafing at the tyranny of miserly old Sir John Stretton, who coops them up in his big house in London and allows them neither liberty nor money. At last Tony resolves to throw off the yoke and in a new land to make a future for himself and his wife. Failure awaits him in his first attempts, until in despair he enlists in the Foreign Legion in Algeria where there is much fighting and honor. Meanwhile Millie, lonely and unhappy, falls under the influence of an adventurer and is only saved from worse by the return of her husband. Interest also centers in the story of Pamela Mardale, a society girl haunted by a mystery, and in several minor but extremely well-known characters.

Based upon the legend of Thekla, the holy maid of Phrygia, which circulated throughout the Christian churches of the second century. Thekla was a young girl, daughter of a noble lady of Iconium. She is led through hearing Paul to embrace Christianity. Refusing to marry a man her parents had betrothed her to, she is disowned. Travelling to Antioch, she is insulted by the high priest of Cæsar, and condemned to the arena for resenting his approaches. The lioness refuses to harm her, lying down at her feet. Her pardon follows.

These letters are supposed to have been written in answer to a previous correspondence which purported to be the letters of a pork-packer to his son, while at Harvard. They are written in a satirical vein and contain constant allusions to the paternal way of acquiring wealth, social status, etc., with references to his own acceptation of fatherly advice. They are also anecdotal and contain apt comparisons, while some well known types of American social life are caricatured.

Miss Hill, the daughter of a distinguished English lawyer, was born at Chelsea in 1825. She was a most precocious child, but very lovable. She had abundant means and met all the great people of her day. She did a great work for education and especially for the practical manual training of the poor. Her work took her to France, to Australia and America. She died in 1902, aged sixty-seven. She was far in advance of her day and labored faithfully to give women a position in school-boards, etc.

The story of a young girl blessed with a sunny disposition, who, though stricken with illness, keeps up a happy make-believe of contentment, interests herself in those around her, and works to bring about a reconciliation between her parents, mysteriously estranged and unhappy. Much of the simple narrative is told in Andrea's diary, which serves to bring together her heartbroken mother and father after her death. In the original the story has won great praise in Germany and Denmark.

The eight Madigans, father, maiden aunt and six daughters, live in Nevada. The children, possessed by an almost fiendish ingenuity in mischief, are able to keep their own home and the community very thoroughly stirred up, with but little restraint from their irascible father and sentimental aunt. The story is suitable for adults, not children, and is by the author of "The bishop's carriage."

The troubles of John Morning, of San Francisco, are described in a novel, which introduces beside John Morning, the rotund Dr. Quaritch and a one-eyed thief, who calls himself Pete Slattery, with a "pal" who prides himself on being a poet. The last named connives to get a bag of gold which John Morning is conveying from Nome to San Francisco. He succeeds by apparently easy means; but by herculean efforts and much scheming the doctor and Morning cover his tracks, and have the perilous adventures related. The story is apparently without a heroine, but heroes are abundant.

Mr. Moody says in his introduction in "The truth about the trusts" a serious attempt is made, in a broad and general way, to turn on the light, and exhibit to the public view, not merely one phase nor one side, but the entire "phenomena" which goes under the general name of "the trust movement." The book is necessarily, to some extent, a simple uniform compilation of important facts, and description of conditions which actually exist. The author makes no attempt to draw upon his imagination, nor does he presume to moralize or sentimentalize regarding the justice or injustice of this or that condition. From first to last facts are pointed out, and simple, logical deductions are made from ese facts. But while the reader must accept the cts, the fallibility of the conclusions must, of ourse, be judged by those who analyze them.

Prometheus, the fire-bringer, is the subject of this dramatic poem. He is shown battling against Zeus, and reawakening hope in the hearts of men, when it had been smothered by the revengeful oppressions of the god. "The fire-bringer" is intended as the first number of a trilogy on the Promethean theme, of which "The masque of judgment," already published, is the second part. The action of each work is complete in itself.

The "issue" the story deals with is slavery. Going back to the year 1831 in the South, vivid scenes are given of slave life and the negro rising and the murder of the whites in that year. Clay, Webster and Calhoun are introduced and their views given relative to the best method of ending slavery. Then the reader is carried on to the Civil War, many chapters being devoted to the battles and the final scenes. Negro and white characters are introduced from various ranks of life, all helping to swell the interest.

Multatuli, [pseud. for Eduard Douves Dekker.] Walter Pieterse: a story of Holland; tr. by Hubert Evans. N. Y., Friderici & Gareis, 1904. 320 p. por. D. cl., $1.50.
The author has been one of the leading writers in the modern literature of the Netherlands. He died in 1887, having attained more than national fame. The present volume tells of the early life of a Dutch boy of New Amsterdam, being chiefly important as a picture of Dutch life and opinion from the inside, and for its caustic scoring of lower-class respectability and intolerance. Not for children.

The extracts in this volume are intended to be used in connection with the text-book. The compiler has not attempted to tell a continuous story. A few general topics have been chosen, for which enough material is furnished for satisfactory work. Mr. R. F. Scholz, Fellow in European History in the Wisconsin University, prepared the references to sources and to secondary works, most of the biographical notices and descriptions of illustrations, and some of the translations.

It is very difficult for an instructor in mediæval history to secure an adequate supply of duplicate books for supplementary readings. The selections are chiefly drawn from modern authors translated and adapted to make selections more useful to students. Designed for beginners in mediæval history, another volume for more mature students will follow. List of works from which collections are drawn. Index.

Munroe, Kirk. The blue dragon: a tale of recent adventure in China. N. Y., Harper, 1904. [O.] c. 4+268 p. il. D. cl., †$1.25.
The national emblem of China gives title to this story intended specially for boys, but full of facts on China that are interesting to Americans of all ages. The author went to China for his facts, became interested in the future of this unhappy country, which he thinks will finally rest with America, and writes this story of an American and a Chinese boy to aid the cause of keeping China a nation open to the unobstructed commerce of the world, instead of being broken up into little colonial possessions for the great nations to wrangle about.

A translation of a work published six months ago in Germany wherein the author, who is professor of psychology at Harvard, strove to put before the German public the political, economic, intellectual and social aspects of American life as they appear to a German. As he writes in his preface, "The only aim of the book is to study the American man and his inner tendencies. . . . The lasting forces of American life are my topics, and not the problems of the day." The book naturally divides itself into four sections, viz., political, economic, intellectual and social life, under each of which are grouped the observations and opinions of this keen-sighted foreigner, whose "American traits" three years ago caused much comment.

A merry, happy party of young people, left alone in a London nursery on a rainy Fifth of November (Guy Fawkes' day), ruin the carpet with their fireworks. Mother buys a new one in a little shop on the Kentish Town Road, which when opened in the nursery is found to contain an egg, very yellow and shiny. By accident, one day, the egg falls into the grate fire, and bursting open, lets out a flame-colored bird. This bird announces himself as the Phœnix and tells the children the new carpet is a magic carpet, which will respond to all their wishes. From here begin a series of adventures in various parts of the world.

"The first part is a monologue of the orphaned heart, breathing sweet memories,—the balm and solace of the bereaved spirit,— as they oft come, in broken reflections. The second part is designed to portray the ideal mother's service, sacrifice, and sovereignty through the study of representative examples. The book, as a whole, endeavors to trace the development of the ideal mother from grace to grace, and glory to glory."—Preface.

Newton, Harry J. Pitfalls of mining finance. Denver, Col., Daily Mining Record, [1904.] c. 14 p. O. pap., 50 c.

The author, for many years managing editor of the Colorado Daily Market Record, has written from the point of view of an independent journalist, basing his arguments and advice on knowledge acquired by several years' experience as a mining and financial writer, and through his associations. Intended for those living distant from mining communities and for those who are otherwise debarred from a theoretical knowledge of mining finance.

Nicholson, Meredith. Zelda Dameron; with drawings by J: Cecil Clay. Indianapolis, Ind., Bobbs-Merrill Co., [1904. O.] c. 7+411 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Zelda Dameron, proud and wilful but true and noble at bottom, returns to her home in the Middle West after years of wandering on the Continent with her aunt. Knowing nothing of family relations, she naturally decides, though much against the wish of her dead mother's family, to live with her father, whom she barely remembers. In the depressing atmosphere of her father's house little by little the certainty dawns on her that he is a rascal, and answerable for the unhappiness of her mother's life. But she loyally shields him from blame and in doing so almost puts away all chance of happiness for herself.

The writer, an Englishwoman, divides her subject into four chapters—"The child," "The school boy," "The youth," and "The young man." "These chapters," she says, "deal with some of the difficulties, troubles, and mistakes experienced in dealing with boys, in the hope that they may be hopeful to young mothers or guardians who have boys under their care."

This romance is what the translator denominates a "day-dream." It takes as its leading motive the combination of the continental forces against Great Britain. It opens with a vivid account of the loss of India by the British to the Russians, and concludes with an even more realistic description of the sea-fight off Flushing and the triumphant entry of the German army through Scotland into England with the Emperor at its head. There is a striking episode of a woman's love and a woman's treachery. It is claimed the story's daring prognostications are founded on facts and on clever inferences from facts.

During many seasons spent in the Hoosac Valley, it has been a source of great pleasure, to the author, to trace mountain streams through moss-grown ravines to their beginnings, and to explore the almost inaccessible recesses of the sphagnous boglands. The walks which carried the author mostly across lots, over hills and mountains and through swamps are described in this volume, which is beautifully illustrated with full-page colored plates of innumerable scarcely known orchids.

"In spite of a plentitude of biographical material, it has seemed to me that there was lack of a readable, compact life of Lincoln by one who never saw him,—born indeed well after his day,—by one who knows him only for what he did, and who, therefore, may be in the temper to form an impression that is unbiased, and it may be hoped also just. I have approached him in no spirit of worship, and have found much in him that does not well conform with my own ideals of humanity. These minor defects of character, however, have not prevented me from appreciating the genius that always burned as a bright flame, and burns still to illuminate the way of the American nation adown the centuries."—Preface. This is the introductory volume of a series which is planned to give a twentieth century view from both sides of the Civil War.

The story opens in the childhood of the three leading characters, whose lives seem to be inextricably interwoven. The father of the heroine "Jane" is an educated impecunious Irishman, whose amusing traits recall characters of Dickens. Jane and her artist lover "Juggs" are both beloved by "Edwy" who gives his name to the book. The love story is the central theme, with its misunderstanding and often tragic episodes.

Oppenheim, E. Phillips. Anna the adventuress; il. by F. H. Townsend. Bost., Little, Brown & Co., 1904. [Ap.] c. 6+320 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

In a story of the social life in London, two sisters play remarkable parts. Although they are of diverse characters they resemble each other in personal appearance, in fact the likeness is so striking as to lead their identities to become confused, and also to tempt one sister to pose as the other. For a time the sister who figures in the novel as "Anna the adventuress," is apparently passive, but later she is seen in some unusual, even tragic situations.

Oppenheim, E. Phillips. The betrayal. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1904. [S.] c. 6+333 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

A young graduate of Magdalen College, Oxford, is discovered, under exciting circumstances, almost starving in a little coast hamlet of England. Through influence he becomes private secretary to the Duke, the great man of the countryside, and is put at secret work, gaining information of the French war tactics. Information leaks out in spite of all precaution and in most exciting scenes suspicion falls upon one distinguished person and another. The discovery of the true betrayer will be a surprise to the most experienced novel reader.

The career of Robert Cavelier de la Salle is a romance of itself, rich in love and adventure, and needing little fictitious embellishment to make it a most fascinating narrative. Mr. Orcutt tells the dramatic events of the explorer's life with dignity and great picturesqueness. The scenes shift from Old France to New France, where La Salle conceived his great plan, and where his love story began. Then follow sharply contrasted pictures of stern privation and struggle in the forest wilderness, and of the glittering, frivolous court at Versailles.

The author has been Professor of Medicine in Johns Hopkins University and is now called to be Regius Professor of Medicine at Oxford University, the highest distinction that can be offered a medical man. After presenting in this lecture that science can find nothing on which to build a theory of immortality, he warns against living by facts alone and dwells especially upon the need of the scientist for emotion and poetry of conception. He hopes his audience "will come at last to the opinion of Cæsar, who had rather be mistaken with Plato than be right with those who deny altogether the life after death; and this is my own confessio fidei." The lecture was delivered at Harvard University.

A companion volume to the "Introduction to English literature." First published in 1897. The present edition has been somewhat enlarged by the introduction of a number of prominent authors into the text, and also by a fuller treatment of the present or "Second national period." Greater prominence has been given to the writers of the south and west.

Painter, Franklin Verzelius Newton. Poets of the South: a series of biographical and critical studies, with typical poems; annotated. N. Y., Amer. Book Co., [1904. Jan11.] c. 237 p. D. cl., 60 c.

The author is Professor of Modern Languages in Roanoke College and author of "History of English literature" and "Introduction to American literature." His purpose is to call attention to the poetic achievement of the South. With the minor poets he classes George Sandys, Virginia, 1621; Richard Henry Wilde, 1789-1847; George D. Prentice and others. Edgar Allan Poe, Paul Hamilton Hayne, Henry Timrod, Sidney Lanier, and Abram J. Ryan are considered biographically and critically. Residents of the South as well as the native born Southerner are recorded poets of the South.

Queen Elizabeth is a leading character in this story of her court, being presented in more attractive guise than history generally depicts her. She is the protector of two young lovers, French Huguenots, who have fled to the Isle of Jersey in her domain, from their persecutors in France. The Earl of Leicester, whose influence over the queen is already waning, also appears, full of envy, and intrigue. The story is a simple one of true love that finds a happy ending. Parrish, Randall. My Lady of the North: the love story of a gray-jacket. Chic., A. C. McClurg & Co., 1904. [O15.] c. 6+362 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.
The action took place in Northern Virginia during the closing days of the Civil War. Captain Wayne, a Confederate officer, was selected by Gen. Lee to carry dispatches to Longstreet. At night, through mistake on the part of a Northern officer, he is put in charge of a lady who is to be escorted into the Union camp. This leads to grave complications, hairbreadth escapes, masquerading as a Northern colonel, and a peculiar misapprehension of the relationship of the lady to the commanding Northern officer. Hospital scenes, guerilla skirmishes and a character given to quotations from Walter Scott give interest to a story fair to the heroism of North and South alike.

A letter, the first the young hero of twenty years had ever seen, came to a little farm-house in Illinois in the summer of 1812. It told the old farmer of a friend's child left an orphan in the garrison of Fort Dearborn and begged protection for her. The young son was sent in search of "my little girl" and suffered many hardships before he met the beautiful Toinette, and even more trouble in getting her back to the farm. The massacre of Fort Dearborn was the climax. Full of adventure, but true to history.

The story takes place chiefly on the sea; first on the deck of an Atlantic steamer; and secondly on board a disreputable vessel carrying ammunition of war to the Venezuelan insurgents. The heroine, "the daughter of the states," is the daughter of a millionaire hastening to England to marry an impoverished lord; the hero is an Englishman come unexpectedly into a title, going home to claim his estates, and leaving a somewhat shady past in America. These two meet on the steamer, and are the only two saved from her when she is run down in the night. The second vessel picks them up, and many exciting episodes ensue; they are pursued by a Venezuelan gun-boat, come dangerously near Mount Pelee during the eruption, etc.

Phillips, D: Graham. The cost; il. by Harrison Fisher. Indianapolis, Ind., Bobbs-Merrill Co., [1904. My.] c. 4+402 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel which depicts some of the social and political pitfalls of American life. The heroine, a strong type of womanhood, is introduced in her school days, as is also the hero, a contrasting character, more noticeable for physical strength than moral traits. He appeals, however, to the unsophisticated girl whom he induces to marry him. He likewise succeeds in hoodwinking the public for a time, but eventually he pays the penalty of his sins, and to his long suffering wife comes unhoped for happiness.

A story that tells why the Farm of the Dagger in the Dartmoor Country, England, had remained uninhabited for so many years and had gained the reputation of being haunted. It dates back to 1813, and includes among other scenes life on board an English naval ship, and in the English war prison at Prince Town, from which an American prisoner escapes and helps forward the story. Two old farmers, between whom a bitter enmity exists, with the daughter of one and the nephew of the other, are the chief characters. The feud between the older people grows to intense hatred, resulting in cruel deeds of revenge, which come near spoiling the lives of the young people, who love each other.

Designed to meet a call from tourists who are visiting the Whittier shrines at Haverhill and Amesbury in numbers that are increasing year by year. Besides describing the ancestral homestead and its surroundings, and the home at Amesbury, information is given regarding the localities mentioned by Whittier in his ballads of the region. One chapter is devoted to Whittier's sense of humor, and a number of impromptu verses originally intended by Whittier to be seen only by a small circle of friends and neighbors are now published to show this little-known side of his character.

In the latest novel, by the author of "Blennerhasset" and "Quincy Adams Sawyer" the letter H is an interesting omen; the enigmatical letter was a birthmark on the forehead of one of the characters, for that reason it wrought disturbance in the lives of several in the story, notably in the life of the heroine, who was a victim of parental influences. The interest centres in the dual nature and singular action of this girl. The scenes are southern.

By the author of "Quincy Adams Sawyer." The principal incidents of Benjamin Franklin's life while representing the colonies at the Court of France have been used as the basis of this story. It opens in Kentucky, with a family feud, on acount of which two lovers are parted, the maiden being sent to Paris. The young man secures a position in the suite of Franklin, and accompanies him to France. Although the love episode of the young people is predominant through the book, we learn the true story of Franklin's long negotiations with France.

A detective story of which the scene shifts between New York, New England and Canada. The formula for a special patent for tanning leather was written in five separate sections, in every one of which appears the quincunx symbol (five dots). The inventor falls into a villain's hands, who steals his wife's love and forces him to do many criminal acts for him. The secrets are unearthed by a nephew of the large leather manufacturer, who bought the patent and then found its inventor was negotiating with other firms. Love and murder help out the covetous schemes.

Witticisms of the stage and some celebrated comedians are introduced in a series of monologues, which follow each other after the fashion of the acts in a continuous performance. De Wolfe Hopper appears first in his eccentric baseball juggling act; Jimmie Powers and his wonderful trained equines follow Mr. Hopper's exit; after the inimitable Jimmie, Jeff De Angelis is shown in his lively farcical skit entitled, "Down on the farm." Lew Dockstader, Joe Weber, Dave Warfield and other vaudeville favorites are seen in interesting roles on and off the stage.

"The object of this book is to give a physical treatment of Maxwell's theory and its applications to some modern electrical problems—to set forth the fundamental principles which underlie all electrical phenomena, according to Maxwell and his followers, to show how these principles explain the ordinary facts of electricity and optics, and to derive from them a practical understanding of the essentials of wireless telegraphy."—Preface. In part 2 Mr. Vreeland takes up the thread where M. Poincaré dropped it, carrying the line of thought into the practical field of wireless telegraphy, and applying the principles laid down in Part 1, with various problems involved, etc.

In the form of a diary an American widow of twenty-two tells her experiences of flight as a moth from a sister who tried to bend her character into her rigid moral mold to the entrancing life of Paris, Vienna and German capitals. She takes her old nurse and takes pride at first in outraging the conventionalities. Fate leads the one man to her whom she cannot dazzle and who shapes her imagination and character until she is ready unce more to be fettered by love and law.

The time is 1205 of the Christian era, and 601 of the Hejira. Mandu in the heyday of its glory is the scene. The principal characters are the Rajah Rai-Khazir-Pal, his wife Ranee Ahalya, Prince Fida Ibn Mahmud el Asra, nephew of the Mohammedan leader, a captive and slave, and Prince Ragunath, the Rajah's trusted minister. These play important parts in the tragic love affair of the Rajah's wife and his captive slave. A ruby of fabulous value also figures in the story.

Braithe Manor on the Hudson, built by the first American Braithe, in exact imitation of the ancestral English home of the Braithes, is the scene. The novel is notable for striking situations which occur in the By-ways, a hidden labyrinth of passages, which were built after the fashion of those that made the English manor famous. The interest centres in the honor of the Braithes and in the love affair of a daughter of the house. By the author of "The house on the Hudson."

Quick, Herbert. Aladdin & Co.: a romance of Yankee magic. N. Y., H: Holt & Co., 1904. [Ap.] c. 7+337 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
Lattimore, supposed to be a town west of Chicago, is the name of a real place, which is boomed by speculators who are evidently real personages. Their schemes effect such a marvellous transformation in the heretofore dull town that the name Aladdin & Co. is given them. Although most of the novel is devoted to discussing the methods of modern land boomers, an old-fashioned love story is likewise an important issue.

The Princess was born in St. Petersburg, in 1858. Her father, Count Adam Rzewuski, belonged to one of the oldest and most illustrious families of Poland. At fifteen and a half she married Prince Radziwill and went to Germany to live. She was presented at court and met many prominent people, here and in France and Russia and other parts of the world. Among her portrait sketches are those of the Czar of Russia, the German Emperor, the late Emperor Frederic, Madame de Balzac, and many others. The writer's dramatic friendship and quarrels with Cecil Rhodes are told at length.

Dr. Rainsford is the well-known rector of St. George's Church, near Stuyvesant Square. Twenty years ago this was a dying church, abandoned by its wealthy members, and shunned by the poor. How Dr. Rainsford raised it to the point of being, as it is now, one of the most popular churches on the East side, is part of the story he tells in this volume. In addition is an account of his father's family, his own early life in Ireland, his church work in Canada, etc.

Ray, Anna Chapin. By the good Sainte Anne: a story of modern Quebec. Bost., Little, Brown & Co., [1904. Ap.] c. 3+286 p. il. D. cl., †$1.25.

Opens in the small Canadian town of Sainte Anne de Beaupre, a sort of American Lourdes. Here Nancy Howard and her father, a celebrated New York physician, and Mr. Cecil Barth, a young Englishman bent on ranching, come together through the young man spraining his ankle while witnessing a pilgrimage. The scene is afterwards transferred to Quebec, where Nancy is the centre of an adoring group of young men, Barth being one of the number. The play from here to the end is very amusing. Bright conversation, realistic descriptions of Quebec, and a good deal of frank love-making fill out the story.

The rebels of the New South are socialists living in Virginia, who hold unconventional theories of marriage, religion, political rights, money-making and other important matters. A philanthropic physician is the ruling spirit. He adopts a boy born out of wedlock and instructs him in all that makes for pure living and high thinking. The negroes in the story are good character studies.

Read, Opie P., ["Arkansaw Traveller," pseud.] Confessions of Marguerite. N. Y. and Chic., Rand, McNally & Co., [1904.] 264 p. D. cl., $1.25.

Marguerite, a country girl with a love of art and a great share of beauty, was left penniless and went to Chicago to give painting lessons. Days of poverty, discouragement, temptation and snares and pitfalls follow. She conquers by virtue of true goodness and noble aspirations and finally comes through love under a good man's faithful care. The book is a warning to girls who start the perilous career of an unprotected girl in a big city.

Read, Opie P., ["Arkansaw Traveller," pseud.] "Turk": a novel. Chic., Laird & Lee, [1904.] c. 4-389 p. il. D. cl., $1.25.

"Turk" is the nickname of the young hero, a boy of Kentucky, the sole survivor of a feud. He gets his name from his numerous freckles, which his boy friends say make him look like a "Turkey egg." The time is in the old days of the south, and "Turk" after a short schooling is bound to a planter. He is a fine manly boy, and tries to live up to his ideals, in spite of many temptations. The escape of frightened negroes, the rumbling of war and social discontent, Turk's love story, and the romance of hidden gold that transforms him to a wealthy man are a few of the interests of the book.

A bright up-to-date story of modern life for girls. Ruth Campbell, the young heroine, returns to New York after eight years spent in a western boarding-school. Her return to her uncle's home reveals the fact that she must depend upon herself for future support. The story shows how resourceful this young girl is, and pictures the many difficulties which she experiences in starting out in her life's work.

Mr. Riis dedicates his work "to the young men of America," offering them in its subject an ideal, he believes well worthy of imitation. He disclaims writing a biography. His book is a succession of familiar, anecdotal chapters, each presenting some one of the President's traits or characteristics, or describing his achievements as seen by an affectionate and admiring friend. The headings tell their story. We give a few of them, as: Boyhood ideals; What he got out of college; Early lessons in politics; The horse and the gun have their day; In Mulberry Street; The clash of war; Roosevelt and his men; Ruling by the Ten Commandments; At home and at play; Roosevelt as speaker and writer, etc. Books by Theodore Roosevelt.

Her mother returns with her and an old nurse to her English home, but is never seen outside of her room, her life being spent in penance and prayer. She hates Rachel, who grows up a wild child of nature, gifted but ignorant and undisciplined. She is unusually beautiful, with great strength of character and originality. Her story is a tragedy, told with unusual dramatic fervor.

"The central thought of this treatise is that the Christian life is the highest mode of moral life of which man is capable, and is distinguished from lower forms of ethical life by its own characteristic manifestations. . . . The Christian life does not replace, it rather exalts, the natural moral life of man. Since this is so, we find the source of our knowledge of ethical facts and principles, in the first instance, in the normal constitution of man, then in the experiences of Christians, and thirdly, in the Holy Scriptures."—The preface.

The author's purpose is to place medicine on "the rational basis," from whence, it is declared, bacteriological aberrations have been endeavoring to banish it." Dr. Rosenbach, as his translator points out, fully appreciates the value of bacteriology as a biological science, and is well aware what surprising information and important methods are to be found in its study, but he aims to overthrow the fallacious conclusions that have been established, that all infectious diseases are caused by bacteria, and that all diseases in which so-called specific bacteria are found are infectious diseases. The twenty-six essays embraced include discussions of every side of the question.

The hero is introduced in Shoal Harbor, Maine, after he has mastered two professions—that of an able skipper and that of a skilful surgeon. The first of these callings he makes subservient to the last, plying it in order that he may see his higher aims realized. When he is almost assured of success, a man who has thwarted his plans on previous occasions again interferes and the result is several dramatic scenes in which the heroine is seen to advantage and the hero shows himself master of a trying situation. The editors of the final complete editions of Ruskin's works (Longmans, Green & Co.) were urgent to have these letters for complete publication in one of the volumes. Dr. Norton preferred to select and edit them himself. They cover from 1855 to 1887 and are of intimate nature, discussing the changes that took place in Ruskin's views of art, religion and life and freely criticising the attacks upon him for his peculiar work in political economy and reform. Beginning where "Praeterita" ended they form a valuable addition to Ruskin's autobiography.

Zenger was the second New York printer; he established himself in 1726 and in 1733 began the publication of the second newspaper issued in New York. It was in tone opposed to the Royal Governor of the Province. Zenger was arrested, charged with seditious libel, upon information, the Grand Jury having failed to indict him. His trial excited great public interest, the verdict of not guilty being received with applause. The work gives an account of his life and trial, with two bibliographies: Bibliography of issues of the Zenger Press, 1725-1751, p. 133-169; and Bibliography of the trial of John Peter Zenger, p. 247-255.

The first English version of "Singoalla," by the author of "The last Athenian," by critics often pronounced his masterpiece. The scene is Smaland, Rydberg's native province in Sweden. The time is the thirteenth century. The theme is the love of the Lord of Moaneskold for a gypsy girl. A romantic wedding and dramatic separation are among the striking situations; there are also tragic incidents such as a murder in the forest and scenes arising from the Black Death are depicted.

The story of a high-spirited Virginian girl of twelve, whose romping ways, make her stern, cold father send her to a boarding school far away from her home in Richmond. She aims from the first to be sent home again, and contrives all sorts of mischievious pranks to bring herself into disgrace. How she is finally tamed by love and appreciation is the story.

"This volume forms a sequel to the work which the author published in 1897, under the title, 'Outlines of a philosophy of religion based upon psychology and history.' Two systems of theology still confront one another; the theology of authority and the theology of experience. They are characterized by methods radically opposed in the scientific development of religious ideas and Christian dogmas. To the solution of the question of method the present work is consecrated. At the present hour one method is dying and destined soon to disappear; the other is taking on ever more vigorous development, and is destined to triumph. The problem here discussed belongs not simply to the order of philosophy. It reacts strongly upon the social order."—Preface.

The historical setting is of the days of Henry V. and the chief events take place on the Scottish border in the troublous days of the early fifteenth century. A girl betrothed to one man loves another who in his turn loves another woman. Both couples arrange an exchange amicably. As they are of the Douglas, Percy, and Neville houses, it was necessary to resort to many stratagems to keep the reigning lords from bloodshed over their frustrated plans of aggrandizement by marriage.

The author who is professor of history, Armour Institute of Technology, says in his preface: "It has been my purpose to trace the genesis and development of the political theories embodied in the Bill of Rights and in the French Declaration of the Rights of Man, and to show that these documents are the results of a long development. I have confined myself to an historical treatment of the subject."

A fact that the author says should be constantly kept in mind is that "the great drama which is now being played in the Far East is the prologue to a far longer and more important one, involving the mastery of the Pacific. As such, no nation on earth is interested in it in the same degree as the United States." His argument is based on both geographic and historical foundations and is considered under the following divisions: The war and its outcome; The far east; The Pacific and the Panama Canal; The race is to the wise; Rivals in the Pacific—German, French, and Japanese; American supremacy and the Slav; Life under new conditions.

It has been the author's main object to lay bare, without bias either way, the sources and extent of both Russia's strength and weakness, and to do so on the most reliable and most recent data and authorities. Among the points reviewed are: the finances, showing the country on the brink of national bankruptcy; the agricultural conditions, demonstrating the exhaustion of Russia's famous "black earth belt"; the complete downfall of Russia's industry, mainly the hothouse product of M. de Witte's export policy; the "mir" and the "zemstvo." Mr. von Schierbrand has travelled extensively through European and Asiatic Russia, and has made that country one of his special studies.

"Dorothea" is introduced in her girlhood; until her twenty-first birthday she had lived with two maiden aunts; on account of her natural bent, likewise because she had never known evil, the girl may well be classed with "the pure of heart." Later she goes to Paris and although she is associated with a social element very different from that of her girlhood's home, Dorothea still preserves her equanimity of character. Even after marriage, when her happiness is threatened, she is true to her standard of womanhood, and remains until the story closes a character study.

The Last Hope was a schooner and the last ship ever built in Farlingford; her captain was reputed to have rescued Louis XVII. from drowning. According to the belief of many Royalists, the son of Marie Antoinette did not die in the Temple but was saved as stated above. The novel is founded on incidents of French history which were the outcome of the Royalists to elevate the son of this mysterious waif to the throne of France. Napoleon III. and other famous persons who lived in the times of the Republic are characters in the story.

"This work has engaged the attention of the author for more than twenty years. Its object is an attempt to depict the civilization of that great race whose achievements in science, literature, and the arts have been the inspiration of the marvellous progress of the present age. The review of this widespread influence, whose ramifications extend to the limits of both Europe and America, has acquired the introduction of some matter apparently extraneous, but which, when considered in its general relations to the subject, will be found to be not foreign to the purpose of these volumes."—Preface. List of authorities consulted (26 p.) The aim is to set before the reader the relation which the individual—man or woman—bears to the government which controls his or her conduct as a citizen. The book opens with an account of the origin of mankind, the beginnings of government, what liberty is, etc.; followed by chapters on the share of the average man in the state; the practice of citizenship; Citizenship and party allegiance; On the limits of freedom; The citizen and the law; Wealth—its origin and distribution; Education, public health, and other questions; Immigration, universal suffrage, and the negro question; Foreign possessions; The citizen and city government; The citizen and his fellow-men; The value of great men to the citizen; The future of the commonwealth. Index.

A study of human relations with special reference to race prejudices such as arise in the contact between the Jews and negroes on the one hand and the Aryan peoples on the other. Professor Shaler shows that these prejudices are due to the inheritance by man of tendencies developed in the stages of life below his plane, that are indeed a part of the evil which has come to him from the brutes. Through a scientific study of this hatred of the Jews, negroes, and other aliens, the author endeavors to found some new considerations as to the ways in which this feeling may be overcome and the people who suffer from it effectively introduced into the commonwealth.

Samuel Keith Richman worked in his father's second-hand book-store. He was uncultivated and dropped his "h's." He was a complex nature and met the world as second-hand bookseller, as student and recluse, as junior journalist, as young man about town, as a boarder in a shabby boarding house, as a genius, and as a man of dissipated habits. The study of his character is ingenious and the criticisms of journalism and modern literature are bold and fearless. Love plays a minor part.

The present abridged edition emanated from a desire to make accessible to the general reader the epoch-making ideas of Adam Smith. The success of the "Wealth of nations" when first published, says Hugh McPherson, editor of the condensed edition, was largely due to the blending of theoretical exposition and historical illustration; with the lapse of time much of the historical matter has become obsolete. Hence this edition, in which the local and temporary element are omitted, making it easier for the general reader to apply the fundamental principles of the work to present day problems.

Smith, Mary Prudence Wells. The boy captive of old Deerfield; il. by L. J. Bridgman. Bost., Little, Brown & Co., 1904. [S.] c. 9+304 p. D. cl., †$1.25.

The first of a new series of historical juveniles to be devoted to the attack on Deerfield by the French and Indians and subsequent events. This volume weaves a story around the Indian massacre in the early part of the eighteenth century of the inhabitants of Deerfield. By the author of "The jolly good times series" and "The young Puritans series."

Smith, Orlando Jay. Balance the fundamental verity; offering a key to the fundamental scientific interpretations of the system of nature, a definition of natural religion, and a consequent agreement between science and religion; with an appendix containing critical reviews by scientific and religious writers and a reply by the author to his critics. Bost., Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1904. [O.] c. 11+286 p. D. cl., $1.25 net.

The cosmic theory advanced by Mr. Smith is based upon the fundamental harmony between physical science and natural religion. Scientific experience and the higher interpretations of the system of nature point distinctly, he holds, to one fundamental conception of science—that physical action is ceaseless and compensatory—that human action also is ceaseless and compensatory.

The first attempt to present in connected narrative the events in Indian political history for eighteen centuries—from 600 B.C. to the Muhammadan conquest in 1200 A.D. The author's sources of information have been tradition, the writings of foreign travellers and historians, the evidence of archæology, and native contemporary literature.

Smith, Walter Burges. Looking for Alice; il. by C. Howard. Bost., Lothrop Publishing Co., [1904. O.] c. 4-196 p. O. cl., †$1.25.

Little Harriet has an intense desire to find the little heroine of Alice in Wonderland, and descends one day through an old well into the land of dreams to look for her, and meets with adventures no less astonishing than those of Alice herself. The story abounds in playful fancies and droll humor.

The two men who are conspicuous figures in the novel are first seen while discussing a gigantic scheme, which was conceived in the brain of the spokesman, called "Starleigh" to suit the author's purpose. The listener named "Goldsby," for evident reasons, is apparently a passive member of the prospective partnership, which hopes by personal effort combined with scientific method to revolutionize the earth. The scene for operation is Nebraska. The ways and means, as well as the results are considered in the story, which touches in a relative way on trusts, railway monopolies, the question of franchise and other issues of public interest.

Municipal and Government securities, etc. The names of over 10,000 corporations are given that have lost their charters by non-payment of taxes or for other reason, with the date of forfeiture. The manual is designed to answer a class of questions, which come to all bankers, brokers, or assignees, and for the use of examiners and appraisers, and all who handle securities or loan money on them.

Snaith, J: C. Broke of Covenden. Bost., Herbert B. Turner & Co., 1904. 2-582 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Tells the history of an English family, impoverished but well connected socially, consisting of a son and five daughters, their father and mother. The father, Broke of Covendon, has an implacable, unforgiving nature, eaten up with family pride, to which wife and children are sacrificed. His wife is broken in her contest between husband and children who are driven into matrimonial mistakes.

Much of this diary appeared in the Badminton Magazine. It is kept for one year by a sportsman who, however, has interests of varied kind. He introduces anecdotes and reflections about new women and things, customs, superstitions and places, while through all runs the love of animals and sport and criticisms of hunting habits, sporting laws, etc., and descriptions of beautiful rural scenes. His wife, Belinda, accompanies him to country dinners and country houses, and she is also very original in her ways of looking at common things.

"The story of the United States has frequently been told. . . . An effort is made in this narrative to find the truth in a medium ground; to trace the gradual evolution of a Confederated Republic under the laws of necessity; to acknowledge that radical departures have been made from first ideals as a result of progress; to take into constant consideration the underlying forces of heredity and environment." In brief, these two volumes tell the story of the United States. They show how the phrase "the United States is," has been slowly and unconsciously evolved in the process of time from the early practice of saying "the United States are."

George Durant while still a young man became head of the great business house with which he was connected. He made a vast fortune in coffee. The story opens in Chicago when this rich patron falls in love with a hard-working actress. At the same time he becomes conscious that he has an organic trouble of the heart. A great physician warns him against morphine and all his life he suffers but is strong in will power. The plot is ingeniously worked out by the author of "The daughter of a magnate."

This autobiography is published as it was left by Mr. Spencer, with a few modifications, the most important of which relates to the division of the volumes. It covers his whole life from his early boyhood to the year of his death and is written with great amplitude and frankness. Among its many points of interest are the details concerning the way in which his different works were conceived and written, and his vivid pen pictures of the many famous people he met in his long career. Illustrated with many portraits of Mr. Spencer and family portraits.

The story of a typical Virginia family who go out to Missouri with their family slaves in the early fifties. A picture of life in the border counties, before, during and after the Civil War is presented. Order no. 11 was the command issued by the Union General, Thomas Ewing, ordering the homes in this part of Missouri abandoned. The family sinks to the lowest depths of poverty; the son of the house dies tended only by two faithful old slaves, the parents knowing nothing of either his marriage or his death till both are long past. The others return to their old home however, after the war, and the ending is happy.

The chief characters in this novel are a great Egyptologist and his young daughter, living near London. The story opens with the daughter finding her father in his room in the early hours of the morning, painfully wounded and insensible. Physicians, friends and detectives are called in and an investigation of the mystery begins. The mummy of an Egyptian queen, which the Egyptologist believes may be brought to life again, colors the whole story, and the savant's daughter's strange dual life when she seems to enter the soul of the dead queen heightens the interest.

A novel which gives a detailed account of the exciting and varied adventures of a young Chicago matron, who tired of her home environments, and thought she saw in club life a means of social betterment. As a club woman she is brought in contact with many society women and has ample opportunities to study the motives of the average feminine club member. The heroine finally becomes so fascinated with the new sphere she has entered that she sacrifices her home interests; at this crisis her husband intervenes; the action of both is interesting thereafter.

The name of Arcady is well set in the title. The Arcady of this bachelor is a small farm nestling down by a river. Here he works when he feels like it, goes hunting, or takes long tramps, and leads a free and easy life unoppressed by social duties. He is particularly careful not to fall in the way of womankind, for he is convinced that here lies the secret of unrest. Nevertheless, the pitfall into which he falls at last is of his own digging.

While playing in the woods of the wild northland a little girl finds a cluster of flowers belonging to the Circœa Alpina species (enchanter's nightshade). She places the magical flowers in her hair, and at once falls under the spell of their enchantment; hereafter all the animals she meets while in quest of an enchanted well are after the fashion of "Alice in wonderland," endowed with speech. Their sayings are so apt that they will amuse older people almost as much as they do the children for whom they are quoted.

Taylor, C. Bryson. In the dwellings of the wilderness; with decorations in col. N. Y., H: Holt & Co., 1904. [Ap.] c. 5+184 p. D. cl., †$1.25.

The opening of the tomb of one of Egypt's mighty dead, by three American engineers who have come on an excavating expedition into the heart of an Egyptian desert, is the episode that makes the story. They disregard the warnings on the outer and inner portals of the tomb, entering into the inmost depths. A mummy of a woman, decorated with magnificent jewels, is found, her history painted on the walls telling she was one who in life had a "devil-soul." The most terrible and mysterious things follow, dispersing their numerous attendant natives, and almost shaking the intellect of the engineers.

The subject of this memoir was born in Kansas, but was carried by his father to New Hampshire, his native state, in his second year. Here he received his first education, entering in the fall of 1895 the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, from which he graduated in 1899 as a civil engineer. He obtained an appointment in the government service in the Philippines, dying there in a short time of cholera. He was a young man of high ideals, that he aimed to live up to. The book contains his letters, poetical tributes, a funeral address, etc.

Edward Thompson Taylor was born in Richmond, Va., December 25, 1793 and died in Boston, Mass., December 25, 1871. His whole long life was devoted to his fellow seamen in their trials, hardships and temptations afloat and ashore. This life appeared soon after his death, prepared by Rev. Gilbert Haven and Judge Thomas Russell. It has long been out of print and is now brought out with many additions, notably sketches by Rev. Cyrus Augustus Bartol and Walt Whitman.

Taylor, Emerson Gifford. A daughter of Dale. N. Y., Century Co., 1904. [My.] c. 5+352 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

As the author of "A daughter of Dale," is a Yale doctor of philosophy, and an instructor of rhetoric in the University, it is but reasonable to assume that Dale is a fictitious name for Yale; it is also fair to suppose that Barbara, the granddaughter of Professor Hare is a real personage; in fact all the characters represented appear to be real men and women. The interest centres in the action of Barbara, and that of her two lovers, who are contrasting characters in the graduate school, and rival suitors. Besides portraying the life of a university town, the novel demonstrates the perils that threaten the overzealous student.

The basis of this book is the material consulted in the preparation of the author's larger works—"A constitutional history of the American people, 1776-1850," and "The constitutional history of the United States, 1765-1895,"—the former a narrative of the civil development of the states, the latter of the federal union. The present volume narrates the constitutional history both of the union and of the states, showing the common basis of American local and general government. The chapters on the state constitutions treat of a subject too much neglected.

This initial volume of a new series admirably epitomizes the history of the English relations with the French and Indians upon the Western borders during the important epoch of the last French War, and its sequel, Pontiac's Conspiracy. Of the authors, two (Weiser and Croghan) were government Indian agents; one (Post) was a Moravian missionary; and the other (Morris), was a British army officer. The experiences which they recount are as varied as were their avocations. Conrad Weiser was the first official of Pennsylvania to penetrate the country beyond the Allegheny Mountains; while his successor, George Croghan, summed up in his own career the history of the frontier. For fifteen years he was concerned in every important Indian negotiation, and his marked success in terminating the Pontiac War is told in a journal replete with unexpected incidents. A collection of the writings of this important actor in Western history has not before been made. The journeys of Christian Frederick Post, the Moravian missionary who was sent by Forbes as an envoy to the hostile tribes on the Ohio, are described by every writer of the period. The volumes are handsomely printed, with facsimiles of the original title-pages, maps, portraits, views, etc. An elaborate index to the whole work will occupy the concluding volume.

The second volume of the series of early western travels is devoted to the reprint of John Long's "Voyages and travels of an Indian interpreter and trader," originally published in London in 1791. Little is known of Long, further than what he himself relates in his book. Coming from England to North America in 1768, he passed nearly twenty years upon this continent, chiefly consorting with the Indians—learning their languages, wearing their garb, living their life. An expert woodsman, fur-trader and explorer, he penetrated into regions north and west of Canada, that are still practically unexplored. Contains a number of Indian vocabularies.

The travels in this volume are of especial interest as describing conditions in the West between the formation of the Constitution and the purchase of Louisiana. This was a time of enormous emigration to the Mississippi Valley, consequent upon the close of the Indian wars and the growing prosperity of the region. The two Michauxs, father and son, were men of trained observation, and a judicious, sympathetic spirit. They have been best known for their scientific contributions to the knowledge of American flora; their ardor in these pursuits by no means trammelled their intelligent and discriminating portrayal of the persons, places, and political and social life of the regions they traversed. The journals of the elder Michaux have never before been Englished.

A love story projected against the background of the Revolution in the days before and after the battle of Concord and during the siege of Boston. "My Lady Laughter" is a beautiful Tory girl who is won over to the American cause chiefly because her lover is a patriot soldier, and needs her help, and is eventually saved from death by her intervention. Historical characters figure largely in the story.

For reasons of his own, the writer withholds his name, although it is admitted he is a prominent railroad man of New York. It was at the suggestion of a well-known literary man met on an ocean voyage that he dictated these amusing chapters from his own experience. Beginning with his life when a boy he shows how by his own efforts he rose to positions of trust and finally became a railroad man. The book is rich in anecdotes that will especially appeal to railroad men.

A novel first published in Japan in 1900, where it attained great popularity, having an unprecedented sale for Japan. It now bears the distinction of being the first novel translated into English from modern Japanese literature. The plot deals with the singular marriage and divorce customs of Japan. According to the Confucian system of ethics, a mother may divorce her son's wife without his knowledge or consent, and it is this rule the author has used as a basis of his plot. The hero is a naval officer, vivid descriptions being given of the battle between the Japanese and Chinese fleets off the Yalu and another of Port Arthur during the Japanese occupation. Realistically sets forth the rapidly changing moral, religious and social opinion of the Japanese.

Tracy, L: The Albert Gate mystery: being further adventures of Reginald Brett, barrister, detective. N. Y., R. F. Fenno & Co., 1904. 2-309 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

The Sultan of Turkey sent a number of rough diamonds of inestimable value to London to be cut and polished. His special envoy charged with this mission and his suite occupied a house at Albert Gate that had received special protection against burglars. Nevertheless the diamonds are stolen, and the envoy and three of his suite murdered, and one man, a young Englishman, the agent of the English government is missing. Suspicion naturally turns upon him. The way the diamonds were taken is most ingenious, and a political motive is shown to have been at the bottom of it. Mr. Brett, a clever barrister, with the aid of a Scotland Yard detective, penetrates the mystery, which is a most interesting one. By the author of "Pillar of light."

Tracy, L: The pillar of light. N. Y., E: J. Clode, 1904. [My.] c. 3+339 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.

Many of the incidents occur in the vicinity of the Penzance light house. The hero, Stephen Brand, when introduced is an assistant keeper; he is chiefly remarkable at this time for his distinguished appearance, which is decidedly out of keeping with his occupation. Later, the rescue of a seawaif and other deeds of daring win him the admiration of his fellow keepers.

Truscott, L. Parry. The mother of Pauline. N. Y., Appleton, 1904. c. 6+297 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The story of Pauline is that of a girl who loved "not wisely but too well." Her life however differs in home environments from the majority of girls who commit errors similar to Pauline's. While overburdened with shame the girl reluctantly makes a confession to her eldest sister, who is the only mother Pauline has ever known. The action of both women after the revelation is worthy of analysis, as is also that of Pauline's lover. This rather pathetic incident in a woman's life is made the basis of a novel for an evident purpose.

A little waif of the London slums dies in a children's hospital and enters the "gray world." He is surrounded by mists and restlessness and ghosts and he makes his escape and re-enters this world as the only son of a middle-class London family. The lad poses among his commonplace surroundings as "silly" and "queer." He has a poetic soul and after many trials meets a kindred nature and they live a life apart, finding in themselves the content and hope that make life worth living both here and hereafter.

"Setting out with the detailed examination of the records of a single London company, I was gradually led to include within the scope of my inquiry, first, the other industrial companies of London, then the similar organizations in other English centres of industry, and finally the parallel development in continental cities and especially at Paris. In this way I came to entertain the idea of doing something, however tentative, to bridge over the gap which appeared to exist in industrial history between mediæval England and the England of the eighteenth cenaury." —Preface.

Upward, Allen. Secret history of to-day: being revelations of a diplomatic spy. N. Y., Putnam, 1904. 7+310 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.
The author presents his hero as an American citizen, the son of a Polish father, exiled on account of his political opinions, and a French mother. He was born with a passion for intrigue and mystery, and gradually developed into a famous detective whom the crowned heads of Europe employed to penetrate diplomatic secrets. In this way he claims to have found out the "true" history of many still unsolved events which he gives in dramatic story form, the titles showing the subjects: The telegram which began the Boer war; The blowing up of the Maine; The mystery of Captain Dreyfus; What was behind the Tsar's peace rescript; Who really killed King Humbert; The death of Queen Draga; The Humbert millions, etc.

The story of "Hezekiah's kortship," which extended over a protracted period of ten years, is told by his dutiful spouse, in a truly original way, although it cannot be said orthography and grammar are her strong points. After giving her motives for literary effort, Mrs. Hezekiah relates incidents of a unique love story which began in the "district school;" unlike most real romances, the ending is a happy, as well as a surprising one.

A story of occultism. Marius who was met in the author's former story "In the sanctuary," is known here as the Magus Balthazar, having had conferred upon him the highest honors of the Order of the Magi. He is on a mission to America, preaching the spiritual life. A young priest comes to him for help and enlightenment and a young society girl. They love each other, but their love is made a means by the "Master" towards the highest spiritual plane. The author's religious views on philosophy are indicated through many conversations.

Van Vorst, Mrs. J: The issues of life: a novel of the American woman of to-day. N. Y., Doubleday, Page & Co., 1904. c. '03, '04. 378 p. il. 12°, cl., †$1.50.
"The American woman of to-day" is represented as a selfish club-woman, indifferent to the claims of her husband or children, where she has any, or to love or affection of any sort. Mannish, independent, superficially informed in scientific matters, she aggressively pursues her way, broken lives and broken hearts strewing her chosen path. Several types of the club-woman are contrasted in the novel, with an attractive normal woman, whose horizon is bounded by her home. The discussions of the "new woman's" views, at the club, or in her own parlor, are very amusing and evidently from life. Mrs. Van Vorst is one of the authors of "The woman who toils," which work brought from President Roosevelt that vigorous "race-suicide" letter.

The author was one of the most brilliant generals in the Boer army, so that his novel is in a measure autobiographic, being founded on his own adventures during the Boer war and his early life in South Africa as a farmer and as a member of the Volksraad, the legislature of the Transvaal. General Viljoen made his first visit to the United States in 1903, and is at present in St. Louis, as President of the South African Boer War Exhibition Company. A simple love story runs through the book.

Among the many men of foreign birth who have become naturalized citizens of the United States and won eminence in their adopted country, few have had a more varied and romantic career than Henry Villard. Landing in New York in 1853, and trying in divers ways to earn a livelihood, Mr. Villard finally worked his way into journalism and achieved distinction as a field correspondent of various New York papers during the Civil War. He subsequently devoted himself to railroad construction and finance and carried the Northern Pacific Railroad to completion. Among the leading public men of whom he gives interesting glimpses are Lincoln, Chase, Greeley, Garfield and Bismarck. Of the great battles of the war of which he was a witness, he gives full and valuable descriptions of Bull Run, Shiloh, Fredericksburg, Charleston Harbor, and Chattanooga, as well as of Chickamauga.

The author is the son of the translator who first introduced Zola to English readers and suffered even imprisonment in his earnest efforts to make a great writer known to his countrymen. He has worked many years on this biography. It is a psychological study of Zola's mental gifts and peculiar deficiencies. Gives a complete history of the twenty volumes forming the Rougon Marquart series both in their literary and sociological importance. The exhaustive account of the Dreyfus case and Zola's unremitting work to obtain justice against military absolutism makes the book of value to historians and scholars.

Wakefield, Frank H. Marriage-limited: a novel. Wash., D. C., Neale Publishing Co., 1904. c. 3-327 p. D. cl., $1.50.

A working out in fiction form of latter-day theories concerning family relations. Here marriages are seven-year contracts to be renewed at the will of both parties. A woman on marrying another man must hyphenate her new name with the names of preceding husbands, thereby preserving a record of her marriages, which by law cannot exceed five. A daughter must use the much-hyphenated names of her mother, until she herself marries. The plot centres in a mysterious burglary and in the peculiar actions of a suspected man.

"The present study of the coal combinations in Germany was made by the writer during a recent sojourn in that country (1902–3). The immediate incentive was the desire to observe more closely the particular development of the world-wide movement of combination. The desire was stimulated by the fact that an extensive investigation of the subject was initiated at that time by the Imperial Government. . . . The writer has had the advantage of making two visits to Westphalia and another to Luxemberg (the principal coal and iron districts), and has also had the opportunity of meeting and talking with some of the leaders in these industries."—Preface.

The first part of the work embraces in five classifications all the passages in which the Hebrew word Nephesh (soul) occurs in the Old Testament scriptures. Part 2 contains references to all the places in the Old Testament to which the soul is said to go after death, under the Hebrew words Sheol, Shakath, Doomah, etc. Pt. 3 classifies according to biblical meaning the Hebrew word Rooagh (spirit) and the Greek word Pneuma (spirit) as they occur in the Old and New Testaments. Pt. 4 contains 1000 quotations from the Bible, conforming statements made in the work. Pt. 5 is a summary.

Scarcely a thread of romance strings together the history of the South as it is remembered by a boy in Georgia during the terrible years from 1858 to 1863. His grandfather's house, upon a middle-class farm, was often used as night's lodging by Alexander H. Stephens, Robert Toombs and many more of the great orators from whom the general public learned their view of the situation North and South. The slavery question is freely discussed but the book is written without bitterness and in the spirit of the historian, whose "Life and times of Thomas Jefferson" and "The story of France and Napoleon" are well-known.

The search for a little girl stolen by the Indians in the middle of the eighteenth century, when the frontier was in western New York and Pennsylvania, is the story. She is the only grandchild of English people, and it is their adopted son, a lad of nineteen, who comes all the way from London to Philadelphia to find her. His adventures among the Indians, and the child's life among them, are full of interest.

The author of "Calumet K" and "Roger Drake" deals this time with life as it is represented in a university settlement. The principal characters are Docilas Ramsay, warden of the settlement, Doctor Haversham, an interesting young woman, and last but not least Albert Gollans, ward alderman, called by the people "Duke of Cameron Avenue." Ramsay schemes to subjugate the Duke and the results of his social experiment are surprising.

As usual, a deep philosophy underlies the author's extravagant imaginations. Two scientists discover the principle of growth and manufacture a chemical substance that makes kittens, puppies, sunflowers, mushrooms, chickens and babies grow. But they cannot stop the process and become absolutely helpless in a world of useless giant products. Learned discussions full of irony and also of cheerful humor are given on scientists, their ideals and their discoveries which so often are beyond their grasp to control and make useful for the real life of the world. The necessity of spiritual insight to direct material conditions is the keynote of a romance that hinges on an allegory.

"It may save misunderstanding if a word or so be said here of the aim and scope of this work. It is written in relation to a previous work, 'Anticipations,' and together with that and a small pamphlet, 'The discovery of the future,' presents a general theory of social development and of social and political conduct. It is an attempt to deal with social and political questions in a new way and from a new starting-point, reviewing the whole social and political world as aspects of one universal evolving scheme, and placing all social and political activities in a defined relation to that; and to this general method and trend it is that the attention of the reader is especially directed."—Preface.

The author's "Ancient history" closed with the epoch of Charlemagne. The present volume traces the interaction and development of the various forces which the ancient world had brought together and which had been partially fused in the empire of Charlemagne. The treatment covers eleven centuries; but as much space is given to the last hundred years as to the preceding thousand, and, throughout, an unusual amount of attention is paid to the history of England.

A story of the summer of 1595 in the times of Henry of Navarre. The king had for the second time embraced the Roman faith and his Huguenot subjects had become his bitter enemies. In a family divided against itself were two brothers and two sisters, one of the latter being the Abbess of a convent in one of the ideal spots of France. She was haughty, tricky and learned, but love conquered all her strength of mind, and her machinations to gain the man she desired caused almost all the events in a very involved plot. Her younger sister is a charming character.

The trail of Lewis and Clark, 1804-1904: a story of the great exploration across the continent in 1804-'06; with a description of the old trail, based upon actual travel over it and of the changes found a century later. As originally prepared, the manuscript of Mr. Wheeler contained copious extracts from the journals of Lewis and Clark and from the writings of later but early explorers of the west. These quotations however have been largely eliminated, as they made the narrative too long. In the narrative proper, it has been the aim, first, to recount the great epic story of Lewis and Clark; second, to supplement this with such material, drawn from later explorers, as bears upon and emphasizes or accentuates the achievements of the original pathfinders; third, to interpret, amplify, and criticise such parts of the original narrative as the studies and explorations of the writer, one hundred years later, seemed to render advisable, etc.

"In selecting these three hundred from the five hundred varieties listed as occurring within the confines of the state and adjacent islands, no arbitrary rule has been followed, the author being guided by her own experience in field work among them. During a test study in 1902, the ground covered was from Mexico to Oregon, and from the islands off the coast to the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada; and in this, two hundred and forty odd species were commonly met with, while the others were by no means rare."—Introduction.

The Tiger of Muscovy was Ivan IV. of Russia, known as the "Terrible." He applied to Queen Elizabeth asking that some young woman related to the queen might be sent him to make his wife. The girl first selected begged to be let off and a young Devonshire cousin of the queen offered in her place. The events which took place in Russia give a frightful picture of the Russian court. The girl was rescued by a lover who had remained faithful since her childhood days and had obtained service with the czar to watch over Amy Robalyn.

The incidents of this historical romance are supposed to have occurred A.D. 710, when Gerent King of West Welsh was defeated by Ina of Wessex and his kinsman Nunna. Episodes that were the outcome of the feud between the British and Saxon churches are described in the story which tells also how Owen of Cornwall wandered to Sussex and why he lived there; how King Ina's feast was marred; of Lady Elfrida's meeting with Gerent, and other scenes which were enacted in Sussex, and Somerset and the country west called Dyvnaint or Devon.

The opening scene is a post of the Hudson's Bay Company. Two woodsmen of the company are sent by the Factor in search of an Indian who has had a long credit and absconded without paying his bill. The men are told to find the man, and not to return if they do not find him. They travel north through the snow-covered forests of the Canada woodland—into "the silent places," battling with cold and starvation. There is a strange love story between one of the men and an Indian girl.

The author of "The spenders" through his characters discusses the various forms of religion that have been accepted and outlived by the world. A whole-souled old Presbyterian grandfather in educating his orphan grandsons is aghast at the effect produced by the dogmas he has held sacred upon the poetic, ideal nature of the one and the self-conscious, diplomatic nature of the other. The older boy refuses to become a minister in the Presbyterian church and joins the Protestant Episcopal body, becoming a fashionable rector. The younger wanders off to find a God and a satisfying faith. On his return he argues that all faith emanates from within and also accepts the doctrine of good works. He sacrifices himself for his brother's domestic happiness. The Episcopal rector finally goes over to the Roman church.

Two articles published in the Century in 1901 and 1902 containing accounts of Thackeray's two tours in the United States have attracted to their author a vast amount of correspondence and reminiscences concerning Thackeray. All of this he has now incorporated in these volumes, which contain humorous letters written by the novelist during his American tours with Mr. Wilson's explanatory notes, as well as contemporaneous comment and records, forming in all a fairly consecutive history of the two lecture trips. There are also facsimiles and reproductions of many of Thackeray's letters and drawings.

The author of this story, Major Winthrop, was killed in battle in the first years of our Civil War. After his death it was found he had left the mss. of several novels, which were published. "Cecil Dreeme," one of these, had a wide sale and popularity. The present story was withheld, as it needed revision, but it has now in Mr. Burton E. Stevenson a sympathetic editor, who has prepared it for publication. It is the story of Mr. Waddy, a New England man, who having made a fortune in India, returns to the Boston and Newport of ante bellum days. His love story is pathetic and unique.

"Wolff has given us a purely human portraiture of Tannhäuser's career from infancy to his final disappearance from earth, identifying him with one of the more noted music singers of the Hohenstaufen era; one person with two names. The mystic episode of the knight's dalliance with the Venus of the Hörselberg is skilfully led up to by a sequence of natural happenings which result in Tannhäuser's delusion as to his fancied sojourn with Venus and her nymphs in the depths of the mountain. Various historic personages—the leading music singers and others of that epoch—appear in the narrative."—Preface.

A study of the works of Leonardo, Michelangelo, Raphael, Fra Bartolommeo, Andrea del Sarto. The author deals with the problems of form alone. From this point of view he has given us an excellent treatise on composition, or design, to use that word in its widest sense, dealing chiefly with the character and action of figures, and the pattern made by them. The result is a trustworthy guide to the minds of those painters who belonged to the schools of Florence and Rome—the schools of pure design, as distinguished from those which placed their chief dependence on color and characters. Profusely illustrated.

Woman (The) errant: being some chapters from the wonder book of Barbara, the commuter's wife; il. by Will Grefe. N. Y., Macmillan, 1904. [Je.] c. 6+376 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
The latest effort of the author of "The people of the whirlpool" and "The garden of a commuter's wife" is more of a novel and less of a nature book than was the preceding story. The scenes, however, are rural. Two types of woman are personified, Barbara (the commutor's wife) who represents the woman domestic; as portrayed she is a most womanly and interesting character; and Ivory Steele, entitled to recognition in literature and the business world, who poses as "the woman errant;" she, too, is an attractive personality. The manner of life, attainments and social ambitions of these women, who are arrayed on opposite sides of a social question, are subjects of discussion.

"The purpose is to trace the growth of the idea of the spirit of God down to the time of the close of the New Testament literature. With the farther growth of the idea, with the interpretation of its biblical meaning which the church has made and the expression of that interpretation in credal statements, the author is not now concerned. . . . The problem of the book is not, What is the spirit of God? It is rather What was the spirit of God supposed to be at each stage of its biblical development? The problem considered is historical, not speculative."—Preface.

The author explains that caricature is not, as so often supposed, incorrect or bad drawing, but good drawing refined and controlled to produce a humorous effect. Some of the greatest artists for originality and humor have been poor draughtsmen, and the book aims to teach technique, governed by law and practice to those whom nature has gifted with thoughts to express. The illustrations give examples of the caricatures of Cruikshank, Nast, Tenniel, Du Maurier, Leech, Keppler, Gillam, A. B. Frost, etc., and are in themselves of historic interest as well as the foundation for practical instruction.

With an opening chapter tracing the evolution of the motor car since the eight century, when a Chinese mechanic built a "wheeled wagon rowed or punted along with poles," motoring in all its aspects is exhaustively treated. Various kinds of motors—the petrol, steam, electric—are described; chapters are given to their selection, care, etc.; and there are letters quoted from prominent English motorists, with hints for touring, and reflections on the joys and perils of the sport. Mr. Filson Young is not only a motorist of experience, but also the author of several books on widely different subjects.

Young, Egerton Ryerson. Children of the forest: a story of Indian love; il. by J. E. Laughlin. N. Y. and Chic., Revell, [1904.] c. 5-282 p. D. cl., *$1.25 net.
The Ojibway Indians, in the days of the story, occupied a vast area of country extending over a large portion of northern central Canada and reaching down in the states of Minnesota and Dakota. A young brave of the Ojibways is the hero; the interest centres in his efforts to rescue an Indian maiden, who had been captured by a medicine man of the Sioux, also in the romance of Nabuno and Pugamagon, of the Ojibways. Incidents which were the outcome of warfare between the Ojibways and the Sioux are introduced, and many Indian rites and customs are described.

By the author of "Sally of Missouri." The hero is a Missourian, high spirited, kindly and tenacious, who pursues his rugged way with indomitable courage to success. He begins life as a doctor, refusing temptations to make money quickly in ways his conscience disapproves of. How he finally wins professional fame and independence in a Missouri town and the woman he loves is the story. The author, Miss Rose E. Young, is a native of Missouri, who has been engaged in editorial work in Chicago and New York.

Young, T. E. Insurance: a practical exposition for the student and business man. N. Y., Sir I: Pitman & Sons, Ltd., [1904.] 15+339 p. O. cl., $2.50.
This book has been expressly written for (1) The actuarial student. (2) The student of fire, marine and insurance generally. (3) The business man. It treats in an elementary and intelligible manner of the principles, processes and conduct of insurance business as a key to the interpretation of the accounts and practice of offices and as a comprehensive foundation for maturer study. The uniform object steadily retained in view has been the presentation and explanation of those principles as the basis of practice; and that, too, in a concise form, with the constant aid of illustrative examples actually occurring in insurance work, whereby the principles may be readily understood.

Young, T. E., and Masters, R: Insurance office organization, management, and accounts. N. Y., Sir I: Pitman & Sons, 1904. 3-146 p. O. cl., $1.50.
Intended primarily to form a thoroughly practical guide to the organization, management, and method of account keeping appropriate to insurance companies. Its aim, however, is implicitly more extensive, since the principles and practices suggested and explained are capable of application to all commercial undertakings.
